The true purpose of education is to cherish and unfold the seed of immortality already sown within us; to develop, to their fullest extent, the capacities of every kind with which the God who made us has endowed us. Then we shall be fitted for all circumstances, or know how to fit circumstances to ourselves. Fit us for circumstances! Base and mechanical! Why not set up at once a "fabrique d'éducation," and educate us by steam? The human soul, be it man's or woman's, is not, I suppose, an empty bottle, into which you shall pour and cram just what you like, and as you like; nor a plot of waste soil, in which you shall sow what you like; but a divine, a living germ planted by an Almighty hand, which you may, indeed, render more or less productive, or train to this or that form—no more. And when you have taken the oak sapling, and dwarfed it, and pruned it, and twisted it, into an ornament for the jardinière in your drawing-room, much have you gained truly; and a pretty figure your specimen is like to make in the broad plain and under the free air of heaven.

* * * * *

The cultivation of the moral strength and the active energies of a woman's mind, together with the intellectual faculties and tastes, will not make a woman a less good, less happy wife and mother, and will enable her to find content and independence when denied love and happiness.

It is too true that mere vanity and fashion have lately made some women authoresses; more write for money, and by this employment of their talents earn their own independence, add to the comforts of a parent, or supply the extravagance of a husband. Some, who are unhappy in their domestic relations, yet endowed with all that feminine craving after sympathy, which was intended to be the charm of our sex, the blessing of yours, and somehow or other has been turned to the bane of both, look abroad for what they find not at home; fling into the wide world the irrepressible activity of an overflowing mind and heart, which can find no other unforbidden issue, — and to such “fame is love disguised.” Some write from the mere energy of intellect and will; some few from the pure wish to do good, and to add to the stock of happiness, and the progress of thought; and many from all these motives combined in different degrees.

* * * * *

In Germany I met with some men, who, perhaps out of compliment, descanted with enthusiasm on female talent, and in behalf of female authorship; but the women almost uniformly spoke of the latter with dread, as something formidable, or with contempt, as something beneath them: what is an unworthy prejudice in your sex, becomes, when transplanted into ours, a feeling; a mistaken, but a genuine, and even a generous feeling. Many women who have sufficient sense and simplicity of mind to rise above the mere prejudice, would not contend with the feeling: they would not scruple to encounter the public judgment in a cause approved by their own hearts, but they have not courage to brave or to oppose the opinions of friends or kindred.

DR. JOHNSON AND WOMEN.

Johnson talks of “men being held down in conversation by the presence of women” — held up, rather, where moral feeling is concerned; and if held down where intellect and social interests are concerned, then so much the worse for such a state of society.

Johnson knew absolutely nothing about women; witness that one assertion, among others more insulting, that it is a matter of indifference to a woman whether her husband be faithful or not. He says, in another place: “If we men require more perfection from women than from ourselves, it is doing them honour.”

Indeed! if, in exacting from us more perfection, you do not allow us the higher and nobler nature, you do us not honour but gross injustice; and if you do allow us the higher nature, and yet regard us as subject and inferior, then the injustice is the greater. — There, Doctor is a dilemma for you.

JOHNSTONE, MRS.,

Is a native of Scotland, and well deserves a distinguished place among contemporary writers of fiction. Her first work, “Clan Albin,” was among the earliest of that multitude of novels which followed “Waverley” into the Highlands;

but Mrs. Johnstone neither emulates nor imitates in the slightest degree the light that preceded her. Many writers, who were quite lost in the eclipse of the “Great Unknown,” have since asserted that he did not suggest the idea of Scotland, as a scene for fiction; that their works were begun or meditated before “Waverley” appeared; among whom, Mrs. Brunton, author of “Discipline,” whose testimony is unquestionable, may be placed. Perhaps, there was at that time a national impulse towards “Scotch Novels,” just as the taste for nautical discoveries produced Columbus, and the attempt at steam-boats preceded Fulton.

“Clan Albin” is decidedly of the genre ennuyeux, the only kind that Voltaire absolutely condemns. It is full of good sentiment, but insipid and tiresome, and gives no indication of the talent afterwards abounding in Mrs. Johnstone’s works. Her next book was “Elizabeth De Bruce,” very superior to her first, containing portions that were highly praised by able critics. A very charming, well-written work, in that difficult class — “Children’s Books,” succeeded. “The Diversions of Hollycot” may take place near Miss Edgeworth’s “Frank and Rosamond.” Like her stories for juvenile readers, it is sprightly and natural — inculcates good principles, and much useful knowledge; and, what is rarer, it is totally free from any thing sentimental or extravagant. Mrs. Johnstone has continued to improve in style, and to develop many amiable qualities as a writer; her humour is sui generis, equal in its way to that of Charles Lamb. Some of the sketches in her “Edinburg Tales” — those of “Richard Taylor,” and “Governor Fox,” are not surpassed by any thing in Elia. These and many others were published in a monthly periodical, established at Edinburgh about the year 1830, bearing the title of “Johnstone’s Magazine,” of which she was editor and, we believe, proprietor. It was continued ten or fifteen years. In this was published the “Story of Frankland the Barrister,” which is one of the most perfect gems of this kind of literature — wit, pathos, nice delineation of character, are all to be found in it, while the moral lesson is enforced very powerfully. “The Nights of the Round Table” was published in 1835, and contains some admirable tales. “Blanche Delamere” is still a later work; in it she has attempted to show what might be done, and ought to be done by the nobility, to lessen the load of misery pressing on the working classes. We may add, that in all her later works, Mrs. Johnstone, like most thinking writers in the British empire, directs her pen to subjects connected with the distresses of the people. Her tales illustrative of these speculations have neither the wit nor the fancy of their predecessors; the mournful reality seems “to cast a cloud between, and sadden all she sings.”

JUDSON, EMILY C.,

First known to the public by her nomme de plume of “Fanny Forester,” was born in the interior of the State of New York; her birth-place she has made celebrated by the name of “Alder-brook." Her maiden-name was Chubbuck; her family are of "the excellent," to whom belong the hopes of a better world, if not the wealth of this. After the usual school advantages enjoyed by young girls in the country, Miss Chubbuck had the good sense to seek the higher advantage of training others, in order to perfect her own education. She was for some years a teacher in the Female Seminary at Utica, New York. Here she commenced her literary life, by contributing several poems to the Knickerbocker Magazine; she also wrote for the American Baptist Publication Society, and her little works illustrative of practical religion were well approved. She then began to write for several periodicals, and, among others, for the New Mirror, published in New York city, and then edited by Morris and Willis. Miss Chubbuck, in her first communication to the New Mirror, had assumed the name of "Fanny Forester;" the article pleased the editors; Mr. Willis was liberal in praises, and this encouragement decided the writer to devote herself to literary pursuits. But her constitution was delicate, and after two or three years of close and successful application to her pen, "Fanny Forester," as she was usually called, found her health failing, and came to Philadelphia to pass the winter of 1845-6, in the family of the Rev. A. D. Gillette, a Baptist clergyman of high standing in the city. The Rev. Dr. Judson, American Missionary to the heathen world of the East, returned about this time, for a short visit to his native land. He was for the second time a widower,* and much older than Miss Chubbuck; but his noble deeds, and the true glory of his character, rendered him attractive to one who sympathised with the warm Christian benevolence that had made him indeed a hero of the Cross. They met in Philadelphia. He felt she would be to him the dear companion he needed in the cares and labours still before him; she has given, in a poem we shall select, her own reasons for consenting to the union.

The beauty and pathos of her sentiments are so exquisite, that the reader will feel they were her heart's true promptings.

Dr. Judson and Miss Chubbuck were married, June, 1846, and they immediately sailed for India. They safely reached their home at Maulmain, in the Burman empire, where they continued to reside, the reverend Missionary devoting himself to his studies, earnestly striving to complete his great work on the Burman language, while his wife was the guiding angel of his young children. Towards the close of the year 1847, Mrs. Judson gave birth to a daughter, and her newly-awakened maternal tenderness is beautifully expressed in her poem, "My Bird." Her domestic happiness was not to endure. Dr. Judson's health failed; he embarked on a voyage to Mauritius, hoping benefit from the change; but his hour of release had arrived. He died at sea, April 12th, 1850, when about nine days from Maulmain. His widow and children returned to the United States.

Mrs. Emily C. Judson's published works are, - "Alderbrook: a Collection of Fanny Forester's Village Sketches and Poems," in two volumes, issued in Boston, 1846. These sketches are lively and interesting, without any thrilling incident or deep passion; but the moral sentiment is always elevated, and this is ever the index of improvement. Accordingly, we find an onward and upward progress in all that Mrs. Judson has written since her marriage. The poems she has sent to her friends in America are beautiful in their simplicity of style, breathing, as they do, the holiest and sweetest feelings of humanity. She has also made a rich contribution to the Missionary cause in her "Biographical Sketch of Mrs. Sarah B. Judson," second wife of Rev. Dr. Judson. This work was sent from India, and published in New York in 1849. It is the tribute of love from the true heart of a Christian woman on earth to the true merits of a sister Christian who has passed to her reward in heaven.

Mrs. Judson had contemplated becoming a Missionary from a very early period of her life; she was devoted to religion when a child, and united with the Baptist church at the age of fourteen. After Dr. Judson's death, she wished to remain in India, but her failing health compelled her to return to the United States. Here she employed all her strength in advancing the holy cause. She assisted Dr. Wayland in preparing the "Memoirs of Dr. Judson," and was herself abridging that large work to form a more convenient manual for popular use, when death came and closed her labor of love. She died on the eighth anniversary of her marriage, June 1st, 1854, aged thirty-six. Few among her sex have won a better fame; long and lovingly will her virtues be remembered

From "Alderbrook."

THE FAREWELL.

Thou art a rare book, my Alderbrook, written all over by the Creator's finger. Dearly do I love the holy truths upon thy pages; but, "I may not dwell 'mid flowers and music ever;" and I go hence, bearing another, choicer book in my hand, and echoing the words of the angels, "Look! look! live!"

I stand on the verge of the brook, which seems to me more beautiful than any other brook on earth, and take my last survey of the home of my infancy. The cloud, which has been hovering above the trees on the verge of heaven, opens; the golden light gushes forth, bathing the hill-top, and streaming down its green declivity even to my feet; and I accept the encouraging omen. The angel of Alderbrook, "the ministering spirit" sent hither by the Almighty, blesses me. Father in heaven, thy blessing, ere I go!

Hopes full of glory, and oh, most sweetly sacred! look out upon me from the future; but, for a moment, their beauty is clouded. My heart is heavy with sorrow. The cup at my lip is very bitter. Heaven help me! White hairs are bending in submissive grief, and age-dimmed eyes are made dimmer by the gathering of tears. Young spirits have lost their joyousness, young lips forget to smile, and bounding hearts and bounding feet are stilled. Oh, the rending of ties, knitted at the first opening of the infant eye and strengthened by numberless acts of love, is a sorrowful thing! To make the grave the only door to a meeting with those in whose bosoms we nestled, in whose hearts we trusted long before we knew how precious was such love and trust, brings with it an overpowering weight of solemnity. But a grave is yawning for each one of us; and is it much to choose whether we sever the tie that binds us here, to-day, or lie down on the morrow? Ah, the "weaver's shuttle" is flying; the "flower of the grass" is withering; the span is almost measured; the tale nearly told; the dark valley is close before us—tread we with care!

My mother, we may neither of us close the other's darkened eye, and fold the cold hands upon the bosom; we may neither of us watch the sod greenening and withering above the other's ashes; but there are duties for us even more sacred than these. But a few steps, mother—difficult the path may be, but very bright—and then we put on the robe of immortality, and meet to part nevermore. And we shall not be apart even on earth. There is an electric chain passing from heart to heart through the throne of the Eternal; and we may keep its links all brightly burnished by the breath of prayer. Still pray for me, mother, as in days gone by. Thou bidst me go. The smile comes again to thy lip and the light to thine eye, for thou hast pleasure in the sacrifice. Thy blessing! Farewell, my mother, and ye loved ones of the same hearth-stone!

Bright, beautiful, dear Alderbrook, farewell!

MY BIRD.

Ere last year's moon had left the sky,
A birdling sought my Indian nest,
And folded, oh! so lovingly,
Its tiny wings upon my breast.

From morn till evening's purple tinge,
In winsome helplessness she lies;
Two rose-leaves, with a silken fringe,
Shut softly on her starry eyes.

There's not in Ind a lovelier bird;
Broad earth owns not a happier nest,
O God, thou hast a fountain stirred,
Whose waters never more shall rest!

This beautiful, mysterious thing,
This seeming visitant from Heaven,
This bird with the immortal wing,
To me—to me, thy hand has given.

The pulse first caught its tiny stroke,
The blood its crimson hue, from mine.
This life, which I have dared invoke,
Henceforth is parallel with thine.

A silent awe is in my room—
I tremble with delicious fear;
The future, with its light and gloom,
Time and eternity are here.

Doubts, hopes, in eager tumult rise;
Hear, oh my God! one earnest prayer.
Room for my bird in paradise,
And give her angel plumage there!

THE TWO MAMMAS.

(FOR HENRY AND EDWARD.)

'Tis strange to talk of two mammas!
Well, come and sit by me,
And I will try to tell you how
So strange a thing can be.

Years since you had a dear mamma.
So gentle, good, and mild,
Her Father, God, looked down from heaven
And loved his humble child.

"Come hither, child," he said, "and lean Thy head upon my breast."
She had toiled long and wearily,
He knew she needed rest.

And so her cheek grew wan and pale,
And fainter came her breath,
And in the arch beneath her brow,
A shadow lay like death.

Then dear papa grew sad at heart,
Oh, very sad was he!
But still he thought 'twould make her well,
To sail upon the sea.

He did not know that God had called,
But thought she still might stay,
To bless his lonely Burman home,
For many a happy day.

And so she kissed her little boys,
With white and quivering lip,
And while the tears were falling fast,
They bore her to the ship.

And Abby, Pwen, and Enna* went—
Oh! it was sad to be
Thus parted—three upon the land,
And three upon the sea!

But poor mamma still paler grew,
As far the vessel sped,
Till wearily she closed her eyes,
And slept among the dead.

Then on a distant rocky isle,
Where none but strangers rest,
They broke the cold earth for her grave,
And heaped it on her breast.

And there they left her all alone,—
Her whom they loved so well!—
Ah me! the mourning in that ship,
I dare not try to tell!

* Pwen and Enna, names of endearment among the Burmans, very commonly applied to children.—Ed.

And how they wept, and how they prayed,
And sleeping or awake,
How one great grief came crushingly,
As if their hearts would break.

At length they reached a distant shore,
A beautiful, bright land,
And crowds of pitying strangers came,
And took them by the hand.

And Abby found a pleasant home,
And Pwen, and Enna too;
But poor papa's sad thoughts turned back,
To Burmah and to you.

He talked of wretched heathen men,
With none to do them good;
Of children who are taught to bow
To gods of stone and wood.

He told me of his darling boys,
Poor orphans far away,
With no mamma to kiss their lips,
Or teach them how to pray.

And would I be their new mamma
And join the little band
Of those, who for the Saviour's sake,
Dwell in a heathen land?

And when I knew how good he was,
I said that I would come;
I thought it would be sweet to live
In such a precious home;

And look to dear papa for smiles,
And hear him talk and pray;
But then I knew not it would grow
Still sweeter every day.

Oh, if your first mamma could see,
From her bright home above,
How much of happiness is here,
How much there is of love,

'Twould glad her angel heart. I know,
And often would she come,
Gliding with noiseless spirit-step,
About her olden home.

Much do I love my darling boys,
And much do you love me;—
Our Heavenly Father sent me here
Your new mamma to be.

And if I closely follow him,
And hold your little hands,
I hope to lead you up to heaven,
To join the angel bands.

Then with papa, and both mammas,
And her who went before,
And Christ who loves you more than all,
Ye'll dwell for ever more.

Maulmain, 1849.

K.

KEAN, ELLEN,

OBTAINED her celebrity as an actress under her maiden name, Miss Tree. She was born in 1805, in London, and first appeared at Covent Garden Theatre, 1823, when about eighteen years of age. She did not take the town by storm, as some actresses have burst into fame; but her graceful and lady-like manner won the good-will of her audience, and she rose in her profession by real merit, both of character and mind.

In 1837, she visited America, and was very successful in her theatrical engagements. After her return to England, she married Charles Kean, an actor well known for his constant efforts to imitate the manner of his father, the distinguished Edmund Kean. Shortly after their marriage, Charles Kean and his wife came to America, and made a professional tour through the principal cities. After her return to London, Mrs. Kean continued to act, and with increased popularity. She is beloved and respected in private life, and retains wonderfully the admiration of those who greeted her genius in early youth.

KEMBLE, FRANCES ANNE,

Is THE daughter of Mr. Charles Kemble, an actor of high reputation, and for many years a favourite with the public. Dramatic talent appears a natural inheritance in the Kemble family: Mrs. Siddons, her brother John Kemble, and her niece, the subject of this sketch, have occupied by acclamation, the very highest places in their profession. Many of the other members have arisen above mediocrity as artists, among whom an honourable rank must be assigned to Mrs. Sartoris, who, before her marriage, was very favourably received as a singer under the name of Adelaide Kemble.

Fanny Kemble was born in London, about the year 1813, and made her first appearance on the London boards in 1829, in the character of Juliet. The highest enthusiasm was excited in her favour. Her extreme youth, which admirably suited the impersonation, rendered her conception of the passion and poetry remarkable. The British public at once stamped her by their approval, as an actress of genius, and she became distinguished as a new star in the histrionic art.

In 1832, Miss Kemble came with her father to the United States, where her theatrical career was marked by unbounded success, and her talents were warmly admired. In 1834, she was married to Pierce Butler, Esq., of Philadelphia, a gentleman of large fortune. The unhappy termination of this marriage is well known. After many domestic difficulties, a mutual divorce was granted the husband and wife in 1849, and Mrs. Butler immediately resumed her name of Kemble. We must, in justice, observe here, that Mrs. Kemble's bitterest enemies have never charged her with the slightest deviation from the laws of conjugal fidelity; that her fame is spotless, and her position in society exactly what it ever was. Mrs. Kemble is a woman of varied powers; she has been successful in literature, particularly in poetry; displaying an ardent impassioned fancy, which male critics consider the true fire of genius. Some of her shorter poems are wonderfully impressive; but she often mars what would otherwise be very charming, by epithets a little too Shaksperian, a little too much savouring of the art for which she was educated, and which are, to her, familiar expressions. Such words give a flavour, a taste of the antique, when read in their original places; we consider them inadmissible in the writings of a poet, a lady poet of our day; they appear like affectation or want of resource; and sometimes like want of delicacy.

The drama first claimed the genius of Fanny Kemble. At a very early age she wrote a tragedy—"Francis the First," which has passed through ten editions. Her next work was "The Star of Seville;" both have been acted with success; and evince a maturity of mind, and a range of reading very uncommon for a young lady. In 1834, appeared her first work in prose, a "Journal," descriptive, chiefly, of the United States. The youthful petulance and foolish prejudices exhibited in this work have been, we believe, much regretted by the author; at any rate, her strictures have long ago ceased to trouble the people of America, and we leave the book to its quiet slumber in the past. In 1844, her "Poems" were published, and in 1847 appeared her second prose work, "A Year of Consolation;" being a description of her tour through France to Rome, and her residence in that city. In this, as in her former prose work, the strong feelings which Mrs. Kemble possesses, or, more properly speaking, which possess her, find large scope.

She looks at the world through the medium of her own emotions, and whatever may be under discussion—the Pope, the people, or the pine swamps of Georgia, the chief point to be considered is—what Mrs. Kemble suffered or enjoyed. Unfortunately, too, she is among those travellers who are nervously sensible to every desagrement; this is a constitutional defect, and as really deserving pity as poverty, or sickness, for like them, it prevents the enjoyment of life's varied current. A French wit has said of such—"Ils meurent à cent ans, ayant toujours l'avenir devant eux—regrettants le passé et se plaignent du présent dont ils n'ont pas su jouër." When uninfluenced by these "noires vapeurs," Mrs. Kemble shows that she possesses a fund of good sense, and a heart filled with kind and benevolent affections. Her style is open to criticism; passages of exquisite beauty, chiefly descriptive, might be selected—but she indulges in slang expressions and coarse epithets, that are entirely unwarrantable, coming from a woman of taste, and a poetess.

In 1849, Mrs. Kemble commenced a series of Shakspeare "Readings," in which her remarkable versatility of powers is exhibited in a manner as striking, and more wonderful, than on the stage. Among her admirers, there are those, who, judging from her "readings," pronounce her the best Macbeth, and the truest Lear which have ever been applauded; while others deem she is inimitable in Falstaff. In 1850, she left America for England, and during the winter of 1851 was giving her Shaksperian "Readings" in London.

We cannot but feel, while reviewing the events of Mrs. Kemble's career, that her purposes have been broken off, her plans of life disappointed, and her pursuits changed, before she had time or opportunity of doing the best she could in any one department of literature or art. We do not hold the opinion that genius is doomed to suffering; we trust brighter days are in store for Mrs. Kemble, and look forward to her mature years producing works that will hold a higher place in Female Literature than any she has yet published. As a woman of commanding genius, she might do much for her own sex—not by ajuring feminine delicacy of character, dress, or language, but by illustrating, as she could do—"the holiness that circles round a fair and virtuous woman," and the influence such may wield.

From "A Year of Consolation."

A NIGHT OF TERROR.

My dismay and indignation were intense; the rain was pouring, the wind roaring, and it was twelve o'clock at night. The inn into which we were shown, was the most horrible cut-throat looking hole I ever beheld; all the members of the household were gone to bed, except a dirty, sleepy, stupid serving-girl, who ushered us into a kitchen as black as darkness itself and a single tallow-candle could make it, and then informed us that here we must pass the night, for that the coaches which generally came up to meet our conveyance, had not been able to come over the mountains on account of the heavy snow for several days. I was excessively frightened; the look of the place was horrible, that of the people not at all encouraging; when the conducteur demanded the price of the coach, which I then recollected, the Chef de Bureau had most cautiously refused to receive, because then I should have found out that I was not going to Chalons in his coach, but to be shot out on the highest peak of the Morvan, midway between Chalons and Nevers. I refused to pay until, according to agreement, I was taken to Chalons; he then refused to deliver up my baggage, and I saw that all resistance was vain, whereupon I paid the money, and retreated again to the black filthy kitchen, where I had left poor ———, bidding her not stir from the side of my dressing-case and writing-box I had left in her charge, with my precious letters of credit and money-bag.

The fire of the kitchen was now invaded by a tall brawny-looking man in a sort of rough sporting costume; his gun and game-bags lay on the dresser; two abominable dogs he had with him went running in and out between our feet, pursuing each other, and all but knocking us down I was so terrified, disgusted, and annoyed, that I literally shook from head to foot, and could have found it in my heart to have cried for very cowardice. I asked this person what was to be done; he answered me that he was in the same predicament with myself, and that I could do, if I liked, as he should, — walk over the mountain to Autun the next day.

"What was the distance?"

"Ten leagues." (Thirty miles.)

I smiled a sort of verjuice smile, and replied — "Even if we two women could walk thirty miles through the snow, what was to become of my baggage?"

"Oh, he did not know; perhaps, if the snow was not higher than the horse's bellies, or if the labourers of the district had been clearing out the roads at all, the master of the house might contrive some means of sending us on."

In the midst of the agony of perplexity and anxiety, which all these perhaps occasioned me, I heard that the devilish conductor and conveyance which had brought me to this horrid hole, would return to Nevers the next day at five o'clock, and making up my mind, if the worst came to the worst, to return by it thither, and having blown the perfidious Chef de Bureau of the country diligence higher than he had sent me in his coach, take the Paris diligence on its way through Nevers for Lyons straight, — this, of course, at the cost of so much time and money wasted.

With this alternative, I had my luggage carried up to my room, and followed it with my faithful and most invaluable —, who was neither discouraged, nor frightened, nor foolish, — nor anything that I was, — but comported herself to admiration. The room we were shown into was fearful looking; the wind blew down the huge black gaping chimney, and sent the poor fire, we were endeavouring in vain to kindle, in eye-smarting clouds into our faces. The fender and fire-irons were rusty and broken, the ceiling cracked all over, the floor sunken, and an inch thick with filth and dirt. I threw open the shutters of the window, and saw opposite against the black sky, the yet thicker outline of the wretched hovels opposite, and satisfied, that at any rate we were in the vicinity of human beings of some description, we piled our trunks up against a door that opened into some other room, locked the one that gave entrance from the passage, and with one lighted tallow candle, and one relay, and a box of matches by my bed-side, I threw myself all dressed upon the bed. — did the same upon a sofa, and thus we resigned ourselves to pass the night.

ARRIVAL AT VALENCE — AMERICAN WOMAN.

I thought, too, of America, of the honour and security in which a woman might traverse alone from Georgia to Maine, that vast country, certain of assistance, attention, the most respectful civility, the most humane protection, from every man she meets, without the fear of injury or insult, screened by the most sacred and universal care from even the appearance of neglect or impertinence — travelling alone with as much safety and comfort as though she were the sister or the daughter of every man she meets.

MY OWN SPIRIT.

"Up, and be doing," is the impulse for ever with me; and when I ask myself, both sadly and scornfully, what? both my nature and my convictions repeat the call, "up, and be doing;" for surely there is something to be done from morning till night, and to find out what, is the appointed work of the onward-tending soul.

ROME.

Here (as every where) we were pursued by the shameless, wretched pauperism that disgusts and pains one the whole time, and makes the ruined aspect of the great outward things about one cheerful, compared with the abject degradation of that which God has made in his own image. Oh! I would not live among these people for any thing in the world; and when I think of England and America, I thank God that I was born in the one, and shall live in the other.

From "Francis the First."

A FAIR AND VIRTUOUS WOMAN.

And I marvel, sir,
At those who do not feel the majesty, —
By heaven! I'd almost said the holiness, —
That circles round a fair and virtuous woman:
There is a gentle purity that breathes
In such a one, mingled with chaste respect,
And modest pride of her own excellence, —
A shrinking nature, that is so adverse
To aught unseemly, that I could as soon
Forget the sacred love I owe to heaven,
As dare, with impure thoughts, to taint the air
Inhaled by such a being; than whom, my liege,
Heaven cannot look on anything more holy,
Or earth be proud of anything more fair.

WOMAN'S HEART.

A young maiden's heart
Is a rich soil, wherein lie many germs,
Hid by the cunning hand of nature there
To put forth blossoms in their fittest season.
And tho' the love of home first breaks the soil
With its embracing tendrils clasping it,
Other affections, strong and warm, will grow,
While that one fades, as summer's flush of bloom
Succeeds the gentle budding of the spring.
Maidens must be wives, and mothers, to fulfil
Th' entire and holiest end of woman's being.

From "The Star of Seville."

AN OLD HOME.

I love that dear old home! My mother lived there
Her first sweet marriage years, and last sad widowed ones;
Something of old ancestral pride it keeps,
Though fallen from its earlier power and vastness:
Marry! we're not so wealthy as we were,
Nor yet so warlike; still it holds enough
Of ancient strength and state to prompt the memory
To many a "wherefore," and for every answer
You shall have stories long and wonderful,
Enough to make a ballad-monger's fortune.
Old trees do grow around its old grey walls,
The fellows of my mouldering grandfathers:
Faith! they do mock us with their young old age,
These giant wearers of a thousand summers!
Strange, that the seed we sow should bloom and flourish
When we are faded, flower, fruit, and all;
Or, for all things to tend to reproduction,
Serving th' eternal purposes of life,
Drawing a vigorous sap into their veins
From the soil our very bodies fertilize.

From "Poems."

SONG.

Yet once again, but once, before we sever,
Fill me one brimming cup, — it is the last!
And let those lips, now parting, and for ever,
Breathe o'er this pledge, — "the memory of the past!"

Joy's fleeting sun is set; and no to-morrow
Smiles on the gloomy path we tread so fast,
Yet, in the bitter cup, o'erfilled with sorrow,
Lives one sweet drop, — the memory of the past.

But one more look from those dear eyes, now shining
Thro' their warm tears, their loveliest and their last;
But one more strain of hands, in friendship twining,
Now farewell all, save memory of the past.

SONNET.

Say thou not sadly, "never," and "no more,"
But from thy lips banish those falsest words;
While life remains, that which was thine before
Again may be thine; in Time's store-house lie
Days, hours, and moments, that have unknown hoards
Of joy, as well as sorrow: passing by,
Smiles comes with tears; therefore with hopeful eye
Look thou on dear things, though they turn away,
For thou and they, perchance, some future day
Shall meet again, and the gone bliss return;
For its departure then make thou no mourn,
But with stout heart bid what thou lov'st farewell;
That which the past hath given, the future gives as well.

A MOTHER'S MEMORIES.

The blossoms hang again upon the tree
As when with their sweet breath they greeted me,
Against my casement, on that sunny morn,
When thou, first blossom of my spring, wast born;
And as I lay, panting from the fierce strife
With death and agony that won thy life,
Their sunny clusters hung on their brown bough,
E'en as upon my breast, my May-bud, thou;
They seem to be thy sisters, oh, my child!
And now the air, full of their fragrance mild,
Recalls that hour; a ten-fold agony
Pulls at my heart-strings as I think of thee
Was it in vain? Oh, was it all in vain!
That night of hope, of terror, and of pain,
When from the shadowy boundaries of death,
I brought thee safely, breathing living breath
Upon my heart — it was a holy shrine,
Full of God's praise — they laid thee, treasure mine!
And from its tender depths the blue heaven smiled,
And the white blossoms bowed to thee, my child,
And solemn joy of a new life was spread,
Like a mysterious halo round that bed.
And now how is it, since eleven years
Have steeped that memory in bitterest tears?
Alone, heart-broken, on a distant shore,
Thy childless mother sits lamenting o'er
Flowers, which the spring calls from this foreign earth,
The twins, that crowned the morning of thy birth.
How is it with thee — lost — lost — precious one?
In thy fresh spring-time growing up alone?
What warmth unfolds thee? What sweet dews are shed,
Like Love and Patience, over thy young head?
What holy springs feed thy deep, inner life?
What shelters thee from Passion's deadly strife?
What guards thy growth, straight, strong, and full, and free,
Lovely and glorious, oh, my fair young tree?
God — Father — thou who, by this awful fate,
Hast lopp'd, and stripp'd, and left me desolate!
In the dark bitter floods that o'er my soul
Their billows of despair triumphant roll,
Let me not be o'erwhelmed! Oh, they are thine,
These jewels of my life — not mine — not mine!
So keep them, that the blossoms of thy youth
Shall in a gracious growth of love and truth,
With an abundant harvest honour Thee.

ABSENCE.

What shall I do with all the days and hours
That must be counted ere I see thy face?
How shall I charm the interval that lowers
Between this time and that sweet time of grace?

Shall I in slumber steep each weary sense,
Weary with longing shall I flee away,
Into past days, and with some fond pretence
Cheat myself to forget the present day?

Shall love for thee lay on my soul the sin
Of casting from me God's great gift of time?
Shall I, these mists of memory lock'd within,
Leave and forget life's purposes sublime?

Oh! how, or by what means, shall I contrive
To bring the hour that brings thee back more near
How shall I teach my drooping hope to live
Until that blessed time, and thou art here?

I'll tell thee; for thy sake I will lay hold
Of all good aims, and consecrate to thee,
In worthy deeds each moment that is told,
While thou, beloved one! art far from me.

For thee I will arouse my thoughts to try
All homeward flights, all high and holy strains,
For thy dear sake I will walk patiently
Through these long hours, nor call their minutes pains.

I will this dreary blank of absence make
A noble task-time, and will therein strive
To follow excellence, and to o'ertake
More good than I have won, since yet I live.

So may this doomed time build up in me
A thousand graces which shall thus be thine;
So may my love and longing hallowed be,
And thy dear thought an influence divine.

LINES FROM THE ITALIAN.

I planted in my heart one seed of love,
Water'd with tears, and watch'd with sleepless care
It grew, and when I look'd that it should prove
A gracious tree, and blessed harvests bear,
Blossom nor fruit was there to crown my pain,
Tears, cares and labour, all had been in vain;
And yet I dare not pluck it from my heart,
Lest, with the deep-struck root, my life depart.

KENT, DUCHESS OF,

Is the sixth child and youngest daughter of Francis Duke of Saxe Saalfeld Cobourg, and was born August 17th, 1786. She was married to Enrich Charles, hereditary Prince of Leiningen. Her husband died in 1814, leaving her with two children, the Prince of Leiningen, and the Princess Anna Feodoronna. She was then called to the regency, and her administration was popular and respected. In 1818, she married the Duke of Kent, son of George III., of England, and on the 24th of May, 1819, her only child by this marriage, Victoria, Queen of England, was born in Kensington Palace.

To understand how deeply Great Britain is indebted to the Duchess of Kent, for the exceeding care she bestowed in training her illustrious daughter, so that she might be worthy to sway the sceptre of that great empire, some knowledge of the history of Victoria's father is indispensable. Edward, Duke of Kent, fourth son of George III., was, according to a reliable work,* the noblest and best of all the sons of that royal house. Yet these virtues, particularly his unflinching truthfulness, made him dreaded, disliked and persecuted, from his youth till his death, by the influential members of the royal family. It was with the greatest difficulty that he procured the means of leaving Amorbach, (a small town in Germany, where he had been residing with his wife) for England, in time for her confinement. The Duke wished his child to be born in the country where it might be destined to rule.

* "The Life of Field Marshal his Royal Highness Edward, Duke of Kent," &c. By Erskine Neal, M. A., Rector of Kirton, &c. London: 1849

“The interesting situation of the duchess causes me hourly anxiety; and you, who so well know my views and feelings, can well appreciate how eagerly desirous I am to hasten our departure for Old England. The event is thought likely to occur about the end of next month. My wish is, that it may take place on the 4th of June, as this is the birth-day of my revered father; and that the child, too, like him, may be a Briton-born.”

The Duchess earnestly participated in the desire to reach England; but that “royal profligate,” the prince regent, threw every possible perplexity in the way. These were at last overcome; firm, devoted, but untitled, and, comparatively speaking, humble friends, in England made the requisite remittances, and the Duke and Duchess of Kent reached Kensington Palace in time to have their daughter a Briton-born. But her royal father lived only eight months after her birth, and the bereaved widow was left to endure a thousand anxieties as well as sorrows. Her babe was delicate in constitution, and the means for educating her as the heir expectant of the most powerful monarchy in the world, were inadequately and grudgingly supplied. None but a soul of the highest order could have successfully struggled with the difficulties which beset the course of the Duchess of Kent. She was equal to her task, fortunately for humanity; the whole world is made better from having on the throne of Great Britain a sovereign who is firm in DUTY. The sketch of Queen Victoria will be found in its place—we will only add here, that, for the right formation of her character, which makes DUTY a sacred principle in her conduct, she must have been indebted, in a great measure, to her early training. Let any mother, who has endeavoured to train her own daughter to perform the duties which, in private life, and in a small circle, devolve on woman, consider what conscientious care it has required; what sacrifices of self, what daily examples as well as precepts in the right way;—and then she may, partly, estimate the merits of the mother of such a woman as Victoria I. of England. How excellent must have been the character that could acquire the authority and influence necessary to direct well and wisely the education of a young Princess! This was done, too, amidst serious obstacles and many discouragements. Miss Landon in her charming way, addresses a poem to the Duchess of Kent, containing this touching allusion:—

“Oh! many a dark and sorrowing hour
Thy widow'd heart had known,
Before the bud became a flower,—
The orphan on a throne.”

The Duchess of Kent should hold a noble rank among women worthily distinguished; she has performed great and important duties with such rare firmness, faithfulness and success as makes her a model for mothers in every rank of life.

KIRKLAND, CAROLINE M.,

WHOSE maiden name was Stansbury, was born in New York. At an early age she was married to Mr. William Kirkland, a scholar of great acquirements, and also highly esteemed as a man of much moral excellence of character. At the time of their marriage he resigned a professorship in Hamilton College, and established a seminary in the town of Goshen, on Lake Seneca. A few years afterwards he removed with his family to the then new State of Michigan, and made that experiment of “Forest Life,” which gave opportunity for the development of Mrs. Kirkland's lively and observant genius, and also furnished material for her racy and entertaining works on Western manners and habits.

In 1839, her first book,—“A New Home—Who'll Follow? or, Glimpses of Western Life.—By Mrs. Mary Clavers, an Actual Settler,” was published in Boston. The freshness of feeling and piquancy of style displayed in the work, won the public voice at once; and its author gained a celebrity very flattering to a literary débutant. This may be considered, on the whole, Mrs. Kirkland's best production, without disparaging its successors. “The New Home” has originality, wit, propriety of thought, and kindliness of feeling abounding in its pages, and it would scarcely have been possible for its author to excel again in the same line. “Forest Life,” in two volumes, was the next work of Mrs. Kirkland—it has chapters of equal merit to the “New Home,” but as a whole, is inferior. The most striking peculiarities of character and landscape had been already sketched with a firm and clear outline, that needed no additional touches; new views of what had been presented with so much life and spirit, seemed but the fatal “too much,” which the seduction of applause often draws from genius.

In 1842, Mr. and Mrs. Kirkland returned to New York city, where Mr. Kirkland became proprietor of a journal of a religious and literary character, the editing of which was in accordance with his views and tastes. Mrs. Kirkland now engaged in that profession which we think more deserving of honour than mere literary pursuits; she became teacher and guide of a select school for young ladies, whom she received into her own family. She did not, however, abandon her pen; and in 1845, appeared “Western Clearings,” a series of stories founded on her reminiscences of life in the West. These had before appeared in “Annuals,” written for the occasion and without connexion, and can only be judged separately, as clever of their kind; some are very charming, and some very humorous; we would instance "The Schoolmaster's Progress" as among the latter, and "Half-Lengths from Life" as an excellent specimen of Mrs. Kirkland's sensible and just mode of thinking, and her happy manner of describing character.

The sudden death of her husband devolving on Mrs. Kirkland the whole care of her children, called forth her energies as an author in a new manner. She became editor of a monthly periodical, published in New York, called The Union Magazine. In 1848, this was transferred to Philadelphia, and is now known as "Sartain's;" she still continues one of its editors.

In 1848, Mrs. Kirkland visited the Old World; she has recorded her impressions in a work, entitled, "Holidays Abroad," a pleasant volume. Besides her natural gifts, Mrs. Kirkland is a woman of highly cultivated mind; and from her extensive opportunities for reading and observation, we may reasonably hope for some work from her pen superior to any she has yet given the public.

NEW SETTLERS AT THE WEST.

Of the mingled mass of our country population, a goodly and handsome proportion—goodly as to numbers, and handsome as to cheeks and lips, and thews and sinews—consists of young married people just beginning the world; simple in their habits, moderate in their aspirations, and hoarding a little of old-fashioned romance, unconsciously enough, in the secret nooks of their rustic hearts. These find no fault with their bare loggeries. With a shelter and a handful of furniture, they have enough. If there is the wherewithal to spread a warm supper for "th' old man," when he comes in from work, the young wife forgets the long, solitary, wordless day, and asks no greater happiness than preparing it by the help of such materials and such utensils as would be looked at with utter contempt in a comfortable kitchen; and then the youthful pair sit down and enjoy it together, with a zest that the "orgies parfaites" of the epicure can never awaken. What lack they that this world can bestow? They have youth, and health, and love and hope, occupation and amusement, and when you have added "meat, clothes, and fire," what more has England's fair young queen? These people are contented, of course.

* * * * *

Another large class of emigrants is composed of people of broken fortunes, or who have been unsuccessful in past undertakings. These like or dislike the country on various grounds, as their peculiar condition may vary. Those who are fortunate or industrious, look at their new home with a kindly eye. Those who learn by experience that idlers are no better off in Michigan than elsewhere, can find no term too virulent in which to express their angry disappointment. The profligate and unprincipled lead stormy and uncomfortable lives anywhere; and Michigan, now at least, begins to regard such characters among her adopted children with a stern and unfriendly eye, so that the few who may have come among us, hoping for the unwatched and unbridled license which we read of in regions nearer to the setting sun, find themselves marked and shunned, as in the older world.

IMPROVEMENTS AND ENJOYMENTS.

As women feel sensibly the deficiencies of the "salvage" state, so they are the first to attempt the refining process, the introduction of those important nothings on which so much depends. Small additions to the more delicate or showy part of the household gear are accomplished by the aid of some little extra personal exertion. "Spinning-money" buys a looking-glass, perhaps, or "butter-money" a nice cherry-table. Eglantine and wood-vine, or wild-cucumber, are sought and transplanted to shade the windows. Narrow beds round the house are bright with balsams and sweet-williams, four o'clocks, poppies, and marigolds; and if "th' old man" is good-natured, a little gate takes the place of the great awkward bars before the door. By and by, a few apple-trees are set out; sweet-briers grace the doorway, and lilacs and currant-bushes; all by female effort—at least I have never yet happened to see it otherwise, where these improvements have been made at all. They are not all accomplished by her own hand, indeed; but hers is the moving spirit, and if she do her "spiriting gently," and has anything but a Caliban for a minister, she can scarcely fail to throw over the real homeliness of her lot something of the magic of that IDEAL which has been truly sung—

Nymph of our soul, and brightener of our being;
She makes the common waters musical—
Binds the rude night-winds in a silver thrall,
Bids Hybla's thyme and Tempe's violet dwell
Round the green marge of her moon-haunted cell.

This shadowy power, or power of shadows, is the "arch-vanquisher of time and care" everywhere; but most of all needed in the waveless calm of a strictly woodland life, and there most enjoyed. The lovers of "unwritten poetry" may find it in the daily talk of our rustic neighbours—in their superstitions—in the remedies which they propose for every ill of humanity, the ideal makes the charm of their life as it does that of all the world's, peer and poet, woodcutter and serving-maid.

After allowing due weight to the many disadvantages and trials of a new country-life, it would scarce be fair to pass without notice the compensating power of a feeling, inherent, as I believe, in our universal nature, which rejoices in that freedom from the restraints of pride and ceremony which is found only in a new country. To borrow from a brilliant writer of our own, "I think we have an instinct, dulled by civilization, which is like the caged eaglet's, or the antelope's that is reared in the Arab's tent; an instinct of nature that scorns boundary and chain; that yearns to the free desert; that would have the earth like the sky, unappropriated and open; that rejoices in immeasurable liberty of foot and dwelling-place, and springs passionately back to its freedom, even after years of subduing method and spirit-breaking confinement!"

This "instinct," so beautifully noticed by Willis, is what I would point to as the compensating power of the wilderness. Those who are "to the manor born," feel this most sensibly, and pity, with all their simple hearts, the walled-up denizens of the city. And the transplanted ones—those who have been used to no forests but "forests of chimneys"—though "the parted bosom clings to wonted home," soon learn to think nature no step-mother, and to discover many redeeming points even in the half-wild state at first so uncongenial.

That this love of unbounded and unceremonious liberty is a natural and universal feeling, needs no argument to show; I am only applying it on a small scale to the novel condition in which I find myself in the woods of Michigan. I ascribe much of the placid contentment, which seems the heritage of rural life, to the constant familiarity with woods and waters—

All that the genial ray of morning gilds,
And all that echoes to the song of even;
All that the mountain's sheltering bosom yields,
And all the dread magnificence of heaven—

to the harmony which the Creator has instituted between the animate and inanimate works of His hands.

A DEBATING SOCIETY AT THE WEST.

One evening—I hope that beginning prepares the reader for something highly interesting—one evening the question to be debated was the equally novel and striking one which regards the comparative mental capacity of the sexes; and as it was expected that some of the best speakers on both sides would be drawn out by the interesting nature of the subject, every body was anxious to attend.

The debate was interesting to absolute breathlessness, both of speakers and hearers, and was gallantly decided in favour of the fair by a youthful member who occupied the barrel as president for the evening. He gave it as his decided opinion, that if the natural and social disadvantages under which woman laboured and must ever continue to labour, could be removed; if their education could be entirely different, and their position in society the reverse of what it is at present, they would be very nearly, if not quite equal to the nobler sex, in all but strength of mind, in which very useful quality it was his opinion that man would still have the advantage, especially in those communities whose energies were developed by the aid of debating societies.

From "Sartain's Magazine."

THE INFLUENCE OF DRESS.

There is, no doubt, a reflex influence in dress. One of the best ways of inspiring the degraded with self-respect is to supply them with decent and suitable clothing. We are wholly unable, at any stage of cultivation, to withstand this influence. No lady is the same in a careless and untasteful morning envelop, and an elegant evening dress; the former lowers her tone—depreciates her to herself, even though the latter may be quite incapable of inspiring her with pride. No man feels quite at ease in a shining new coat; he is conscious of an inequality between his present self and the old friend whom he could have met so warmly yesterday. The friend may not notice the coat or its influence, but the wearer never forgets it. The Spectator, or some one of those cunning old observers, tells of a young lady who carried herself with unusual hauteur, and seemed to feel a new consciousness of power, upon no greater occasion than the wearing of a new pair of elegant garters. This affords an argument both for and against dress. We ought not to wear what makes us proud and creates a secret contempt of others; but neither should we neglect any thing that aids our self-respect and keeps our spirits at the proper pitch. Some parents, from the best motives in the world, do their children serious injury by wilfully denying them such dress as may put them on an outward equality with their young companions, or make them feel equal. It is in vain to be philosophical for other people; we must convince their judgments and bring them over to our way of thinking, before we can obtain true and healthy conformity. We submit with tolerable grace to restraints rendered necessary by circumstances, but those which appear to us capricious or arbitrary do not often make us better, especially where they touch our pride—that tissue of irritable nerves in which our moral being is enwrapt.

* * * * *

When we are used to the feeling which accompanies rich and recherché costume, a lower style seems to us mean and unworthy, especially on ourselves—it is well if the influence go no further. What pitiable instances we see of a depression that has no better source than the lack of means to dress expensively, after the habit had been formed; what a craven spirit is that which has nothing better to sustain it than the consciousness of elegant clothing! Poor human nature!

DRESS OF SERVANTS.

Every one must have noticed the effect of dress upon the character and condition of servants. Those who have grown up in houses where slovenly personal habits are allowed, never become really respectable, even although they may have many good qualities. They do not respect themselves, and their sympathy with their employers is blunted by the great difference in outward appearance. It is true that domestics sometimes act so earnestly upon this principle, that they end in erring on the side of too much attention to costume. We remember once, and once only, finding at a foreign hotel a chambermaid dressed in silk, with artificial roses in her hair; the feeling that she would not be of much use to us flashing across the mind at once. English servants hit the happy medium oftener than any other; their tidiness suggests alacrity, and we have a comfortable assurance of being well served, as soon as we look upon them. It is odd what a difference one feels in offering a gratuity to a well or ill-dressed attendant in travelling. Shabbiness favours our penuriousness, most remarkably! The eye scans the expectant instinctively, and instead of the generous impulse to give most liberally to those who need, we graduate our donation by the probable expectation of one who has evidently not found the world very generous. If the servant be well enough dressed to bespeak independence, and especially if he be gifted with the modest assurance which is often both cause and consequence of good fortune, pride whispers us at once not to disgust so genteel a person by a shabby gift, and we bestow on success what we should grudge to necessity.

DRESS OF LADIES.

Women generally have an intense dislike to the picturesque style in female dress, and they are not at all apt to think favourably of the stray sheep who adopt it. Some "ill-advised" persons fancy that ladies dress for the eyes of gentlemen, but this opinion shows little knowledge of the sex. Gentlemen dress for ladies, but ladies for each other. The anxiety that is felt about the peculiarities of fashion, the chase after novelty, the thirst for expense, all refer to women's judgment and admiration, for of these particulars men know nothing. Here we touch upon the point in question. Women who depart from fashion in search of the picturesque are suspected of a special desire to be charming to the other sex, a fault naturally unpardonable, for ought we not all to start fair? Has any individual a right to be weaving private nets, and using unauthorized charms? A lady who values her character, had better not pretend to be independent of the fashion. The extra admiration of a few of her more poetical beaux will not compensate for the angry sarcasms she must expect from her own sex. This is a matter in which we find it hard to be merciful, or even candid.

Shall the becoming, then, be sacrificed to the caprices of fashion, which consults neither complexion, shape, nor air, but considers the female sex only as a sort of dough, which is to be moulded at pleasure, and squeezed into all possible forms, at the waving of a wand? We do not go so far. There are rules of taste, — standards of grace and beauty, — boundaries of modesty and propriety, — restraints of Christian benevolence. Saving and excepting the claims of these, we say follow the fashion enough to avoid singularity, and do not set up to be an inventor in costume.

L.

LEE, HANNAH F.,

Is now a resident of Boston, Massachusetts, of which state she is a native. Her birth-place was Newburyport, where her father was an eminent physician. Mrs. Lee has for many years been a widow, and so situated as not to be influenced by pecuniary motives in devoting a part of her time to literature. She wrote from a full heart, sympathizing with those who suffered from lack of knowledge respecting the causes of their troubles. Her "Three Experiments of Living," published about 1838, was written during a season of commercial distress, when every one was complaining of "hard times." She embodied in this tale the thoughts suggested by scenes around her, without any idea of publication. The friends who read her manuscript insisted on its being printed, and one of them, the late John Pickering, Esq., well known in the literary and scientific world, gave the manuscript to the printer, and saw to its execution. The unparalleled success of this work justified his opinion. Edition after edition was called for, (about thirty have been issued in America,) and we may say, that in no country has a work, teaching the morals of domestic life, met with such success. It circulated widely from the English press, and was advertised in large letters in the bookstores at Dresden. The name of the author was for a long time unknown, as Mrs. Lee had never prefixed it to any publication.

Her next work was the "Old Painters," written with the earnest desire of benefiting youth by mingling instruction with amusement. Her succeeding works, "Luther and his Times," "Cranmer and his Times," and the "Huguenots in France and America," were written from the same motive. Mrs. Lee's first publication was entitled "Grace Seymour," a novel. Nearly the whole edition of this work was burnt in the great fire at New York, before many of the volumes had been bound and issued. She has never reprinted it, though some of her friends think it one of her best writings. Another little book, "Rosanna, or Scenes in Boston," was written by particular desire, to increase the funds of a charity school. As her name has not been prefixed to any of her books, it is impossible to enumerate all which have proceeded from her pen; we may, however, mention a volume of tales, and also several small tracts. One of these, "Rich Enough," was written to illustrate the insane desire of accumulating wealth which at that time prevailed. The "Contrast, or Different Modes of Education," "The World before You, or the Log-Cabin," are titles of two of her other little books. In 1849, she published a small volume of "Stories from Life for the Young." Her first known publication was the appendix to Miss Hannah Adams' memoir of herself, edited by Dr. Joseph Tuckerman. Nearly all Mrs. Lee's works have been republished in England.

In contrasting the genius of the sexes, we should always estimate the moral effect of mental power: the genius which causes or creates the greatest amount of good to humanity should take the highest rank. The Hon. John Pickering, to whom allusion is made as the friend of Mrs. Lee, was a profound scholar, an eminent lawyer, a philologist of high attainments; and yet, probably, the greatest benefit his talents conferred on his country, was his aid and encouragement in developing the talents of Mrs. Lee. Her moral influence has had a power for good over domestic life, and on the formation of character, which incalculably outweighs all speculative philosophies. Great reverence is due to the memory of Mr. Pickering for his high estimation of woman's moral power.

From "Three Experiments of Living."

BEGINNING LIFE.

Most young physicians begin life with some degree of patronage, but Frank Fulton had none; he came to the city a stranger, from the wilds of Vermont, fell in love with Jane Churchwood,—uncle Joshua's niece,—a man whom nobody knew, and whose independence consisted in limiting his wants to his means. What little he could do for Jane, he cheerfully did. But after all necessary expenses were paid, the young people had but just enough between them to secure their first quarter's board, and place a sign on the corner of the house, by special permission, with Doctor Fulton handsomely inscribed upon it. The sign seemed to excite but little attention,—as nobody called to see the owner of it,—though he was at home every hour in the day.

After a week of patient expectation, which could not be said to pass heavily,—for they worked, read and talked together,—Frank thought it best to add to the sign, Practises for the poor gratis. At the end of a few days another clause was added, Furnishes medicines to those who cannot afford to pay for them. In a very short time, the passers by stopped to spell out the words, and Frank soon began to reap the benefit of this addition. Various applications were made, and though they did not as yet promise any increase of revenue, he was willing to pay for the first stepping-stone. What had begun, however, from true New England calculation, was continued from benevolence. He was introduced to scenes of misery, that made him forget all but the desire of relieving the wretchedness he witnessed; and when he related to his young and tender-hearted wife, the situation in which he found a mother confined to her bed, with two or three helpless children crying around her for bread, Jane would put on her straw bonnet, and follow him with a light step to the dreary abode. The first quarter's board came round; it was paid, and left them nearly penniless. There is something in benevolent purpose, as well as in industry, that cheers and supports the mind. Never was Jane's step lighter, nor her smile gayer, than at present. But this could not last; the next quarter's board must be provided,—and how? Still the work of mercy went on, and did not grow slack.

THE REWARD.

It would be pleasant to dwell longer on this period of Dr. Fulton's life. It was one of honest independence. Their pleasures were home pleasures,—the purest and the most satisfactory that this world affords. We cannot but admit that they might have been elevated and increased by deeper and more fervent principle. Nature had been bountiful in giving them kind and gentle dispositions, and generous emotions; but the bark, with its swelling sails and gay streamers, that moves so gallantly over the rippling waters, struggles feebly against the rushing wind and foaming wave. Prosperous as Frank might be considered, he had attained no success beyond what every industrious, capable young man may obtain, who, from his first setting out in life, scrupulously limits his expenses within his means. This is, in fact, to be his text-book and his ægis. Not what others do,—not what seems necessary and fitting to his station in life,—but what he, who knows his own affairs, can decide is in reality fitting. Shall we, who so much prize our independence, give up what, in a political view alone, is dross, compared to independence of character and habits? Shall we, who can call master spirits from every portion of our land, to attest to the hard-earned victory of freedom and independence, give up the glorious prize, and suffer our minds to be subjugated by foreign luxuries and habits? Yet it is even so; they are fast invading our land; they have already taken possession of our sea-ports, and are hastening towards the interior. Well may British travellers scoff, when they come amongst us, and see our own native Americans adopting the most frivolous parts of civilized life,—its feathers and gewgaws,—our habits and customs made up of awkward imitations of English and French; our weak attempts at aristocracy; our late hours of visiting, for which no possible reason can be assigned, but that they do so in Europe! Let us rather, with true independence, adopt the good of every nation,—their arts and improvements,—their noble and liberal institutions,—their literature,—and the grace and real refinements of their manners; but let us strive to retain our simplicity, our sense of what is consistent with our own glorious calling, and above all, the honesty and wisdom of living within our income, whatever it may be. This is our true standard. Let those who can afford it, consult their own taste in living. If they prefer elegance of furniture, who has a right to gainsay it? But let us not all aim at the same luxury. Perhaps it is this consciousness of unsuccessful imitation that has given a colour to the charge made against us, by the English, of undue irritability. Truly, there is nothing more likely to produce it. Let us pursue our path with a firm and steadfast purpose, as did our fathers of the Revolution, and we shall little regard those who, after receiving our hospitality, retire to a distance, and pelt us with rubbish.

LIVING BEYOND THE MEANS.

Jane was not behind Mrs. Bradish, in costume or figure. Every morning, at the hour for calls, she was elegantly attired for visitors. Many came from curiosity. Mrs. Hart congratulated her dear friend, on seeing her moving in a sphere for which it was evident nature intended her. Mrs. Reed cautioned her against any mauvaise honte, that might remind one of former times. Others admired her furniture and arrangements, without any sly allusions. On one of these gala mornings, uncle Joshua was ushered into the room. Jane was fortunately alone, and she went forward and offered two fingers with a cordial air, but whispered to the servant, "if any one else called while he was there, to say she was engaged." She had scrupulously observed her promise, of never sending word she was not at home. There was a mock kind of deference in his air and manner, that embarrassed Jane.

"So," said he, looking round him, "we have a palace here!"

"The house we were in was quite too small, now that our children are growing so large," replied Jane.

"They must be greatly beyond the common size," said uncle Joshua, "if that house could not hold them."

"It was a very inconvenient one; and we thought, as it was a monstrous rent, it would do better to take another. Then, after we had bought this, it certainly was best to furnish it comfortably, as it was for life."

"Is it paid for?" asked uncle Joshua, drily. Jane hesitated.

"Paid for? O certainly; that is,—yes, sir."

"I am glad to hear it; otherwise, I much doubt if it is taken for life."

Jane was silent.

"Very comfortable," said uncle Joshua; "that is a comfortable glass for your husband to shave by; and those are comfortable curtains, to keep out the sun and cold." Both of these articles were strikingly elegant. "That is a comfortable lamp that hangs in the middle of the room; it almost puts out my eyes with its glass dangles. Times are strangely altered, Jane, since you and I thought such comforts necessary."

"Frank has been very successful in his speculations, uncle; he does not now depend on his profession for a living; indeed, he thinks it his duty to live as other people do, and place his wife and children upon an equality with others."

"And what do you call an equality,—living as luxuriously, and wasting as much time, as they do? Dwelling in as costly apartments, and forgetting there is any other world than this? When you were left to my care, and your dear mother was gone from us, how often I lamented that I could not supply her place,—that I could not better talk to you of another world, to which she had gone; but then, Jane, I comforted myself that I knew something of the duties that belonged to this, and that, if I faithfully instructed you in these, I should be preparing you for another. When I saw you growing up, dutiful and humble, charitable and self-denying, sincere, and a conscientious disciple of truth, then I felt satisfied that all was well. But I begin now to fear that it was a short-sighted kind of instruction,—that it had not power enough to enable us to hold fast to what is right. I begin now to see that we must have motives that do not depend on the praise or censure of this world,—motives that must have nothing to do with it."

"Frank told me the other day," said Jane, "that he thought you were growing quite religious."

"If I am," said uncle Joshua, "it is from the conviction that I want higher motives than this world can give. When I lost you, Jane, I was a poor solitary being. The world, you know, is not much to me, and I was still less to that. For a time, you were still my own Jane; but when your family increased, and—as was very natural—you were occupied by it, then I was thrown quite on myself. And a dreary prospect it was. Then I asked myself, if all was to end here? Not but what I believed in another world, but it was just as I believed in England or France: but now, Jane, I have thought it over, till I feel that heaven is a land I am going to, and the Bible my chart to steer by; and I am no longer solitary or alone. Now, my dear Jane, I want you to believe it."

"I do, uncle," said Jane, affectionately; "you always taught me that my mother had gone to heaven, and that if I was good, I should go, too."

"Ah, but, my dear child, I want you to feel it,—to feel the comfort and blessing of God's presence. It seems to me that when we once realize the glory of heaven, we shall not think much of these earthly palaces. Do not wait till you go to heaven, to realize God's presence, but feel that he is with you always,—teach it to your children—win your husband to the truth."

LESLIE, ELIZA,

Is a native of Philadelphia, where she has resided the greater portion of her life. Her paternal ancestors were from Scotland; her great-grandfather, Robert Leslie, emigrated to the then colony of Maryland about the year 1745. The father of Miss Leslie removed to Philadelphia before she was born; but he had previously married, in Maryland, the granddaughter of a worthy Swede; and thus Miss Leslie, who has been criticised as an English authoress, "has not," to quote her own words, "a drop of English blood in her veins." The mistake probably arose from the circumstance that, when she was a child, her father took his family with him to London for a few years, and afterwards to Portugal; and her brother, Charles Leslie, the distinguished artist, settled in London. This American family of Leslies are very talented, and, moreover, have won success, which genius does not always achieve. Miss Anne Leslie, a younger sister of Miss Eliza, has succeeded, as an artist, beyond what females usually do; she has copied her brother's pictures with such truth and spirit, that her work is often mistaken for the original.

After the return of Mr. Leslie, Senior, to Philadelphia, he engaged in business; yet, being fond of books, he devoted much of his time, while abroad and when in his own land, to mathematics and natural philosophy. These pursuits brought him, before he went abroad, into intimacy with Franklin, Jefferson, Rittenhouse, and other philosophers of the day; and his reminiscences of these distinguished men had, doubtless, an abiding influence on the mind of his young and gifted daughter, the bent of whose genius has always been towards the useful and practical.

Miss Leslie's first book, "Seventy-Five Receipts," a little manual to assist ladies in their housekeeping, owed its appearance to this desire of being useful. She had had the benefit of an institution, peculiar to Philadelphia, which may be termed "A Cooking School for Young Ladies," where practical instruction was given in the mysteries of making cakes, pastry, preserves, &c. At this school, under the care of Mrs. Goodfellow, (no relation of Robin,) who acquired a great reputation in her way, Miss Leslie not only graduated among the highest, but she had the good sense to secure her acquirements by taking notes. She soon found herself the authority to whom appeal was made, on any special occasion, for this scientific skill in cookery. She grew tired of writing out receipts for her "five hundred friends," and, yielding to the counsels of her brother, prepared the book for publication, about the year 1829. Its success was so signal, that the publisher proposed to Miss Leslie the writing of a work for children. With much persuasion, she was prevailed on to undertake this, and produced several books for juvenile readers, which were very popular and useful. "The Mirror" was the first of the series; then followed "The Young American," "Atlantic Tales," "Stories for Emma," and "The American Girl's Book," published in 1832. Prior to this, Miss Leslie commenced writing for Godey's Lady's Book, and her contributions were continued, with but slight intermissions, till 1850. She also contributed to other periodicals, and has been editor of monthlies and annuals. Her various papers have been, in part, collected and published, with the title of "Pencil Sketches, or Outlines of Character and Manners." The first volume was published in 1833, and contained "Mrs. Washington Potts," a prize tale, which has been very much praised. The second volume was published in 1835, and the third in 1837. During these years, she prepared a large work on "Cookery," which has met with great favour; also, "The House Book," a useful manual for young housekeepers; and the "Ladies' New Receipt Book."

In 1841, "Althea Vernon" appeared; and in 1848, was published her longest and most finished fictitious narrative, "Amelia; or a Young Lady's Vicissitudes," in one volume. Miss Leslie has quick observation, a retentive memory, a sprightly fancy, and a persevering mind; she has also the great merit of being free from affectation; her purpose is always to be useful, to correct faults, expose follies, and wage war with what is perverse and contemptible. If, in doing this, she sometimes seems severe on what are called trifles, it should be borne in mind, that from these little faults grave misfortunes not unfrequently have their origin; and Miss Leslie is such a true-hearted American, that she earnestly desires to aid her countrywomen in becoming perfect. Few of our female writers have wielded so powerful an influence, or been more widely read. Her "Sketches and Stories," scattered through periodicals, are soon to be issued in a convenient form for popular circulation. Miss Leslie is now engaged in preparing "The Behaviour Book;" and the "Life of John Fitch," the first experimenter in steam navigation. For this, she has abundant materials, as that unfortunate man of science was an intimate friend of her father's, who took a deep interest in his projects, afterwards realized by Fulton.

LOVE AT FIRST SIGHT.

Albert Colesbury, of Philadelphia, fell in love with Catherine Branchley, of New York, at a quarter past ten o'clock, while dancing opposite to her on the evening of his arrival at Ballston Springs; there being a ball at the Sans Souci Hotel. Perhaps the precise moment selected by Cupid for directing his shaft towards the heart of our hero, was that in which the young lady acknowledged, with a graceful bow, and a smile of unaffected sweetness, his civility in presenting to her a sprig of jessamine that had fallen from her hair. Shortly after, another sprig of jessamine happened to fall; and this time, Colesbury was so dishonest as not to return it, but took an opportunity of slipping it within his vest.

When the set was over, he hastened to procure an introduction to Miss Branchley, by means of a young New Yorker, whom he knew, and who had just been dancing with her. Our hero would have gladly engaged her for the next set, but her hand was already promised to another gentleman; however, she smilingly consented to give it to Colesbury for the set following. Having no inclination to dance with any one else, he took his seat beside Mrs. Seabright, a young widow, whom he had frequently met with at places of public resort, where she generally did him the favour to matronize him. Colesbury, unable to think of anything else, broke forth into warm encomiums on the beauty of Miss Branchley, and even manifested his intention of endeavouring to engage her for every succeeding set. To do him justice, she really was pretty.

Mrs. Seabright judiciously cautioned the impetuous innamorato against all violent measures, as they would certainly have a tendency to excite false hopes in the heart of a poor simple girl, who had evidently just come out, and was of course inexperienced in both balls and beaux.

"False hopes!" exclaimed Colesbury. "Why should her hopes be false?"

"Oh!" replied Mrs. Seabright, who considered herself a wit, "the heart of the young lady may be tender, while that of the gentleman is only tinder."

"She is the most exquisite creature I ever saw in my life," returned our hero—"and the hope should be on my side rather than on hers. I am not a man to be taken by mere external beauty—but look at the faultless symmetry of her figure!

"Tis not a set of features, or complexion,
The tincture of a skin that I admire;"

But was there ever a purer red and white, or a nose, mouth, and chin, all more perfectly lovely? Yet these are not the charms to make an impression on my heart. Only look at the heavenly blue of her eyes, and the wavy go of her hair! Certainly I am well aware that

"All that's bright must fade,
The brightest still the fleetest;"

What pearly teeth she has; so even, and so perfect! And then the turn of her head! Still I have no wish to possess a beautiful casket, unless it holds a gem within. But if, upon further acquaintance with Miss Branchley, I find her mind equal to her person, I shall esteem myself the happiest of men, if she will allow me to hope for her favour, and I will then lose no time in endeavouring to secure her as the partner of my life."

"Love at first sight is certainly a most amusing thing," remarked Mrs. Seabright, "at least to the by-standers."

"I am not in love," replied Colesbury, in a calmer tone—"not in the least in love. I must first be convinced of the mental qualities of the lady."

To be brief—the next was a country dance, and before it was over, Colesbury had ascertained that Miss Branchley's mind was equal to her person, and his resolution was taken to declare himself as soon as propriety would allow. This term of probation did not prove very tedious, for the important avowal was made the very next morning on their way back from the spring to the house; the fair Kitty having looked divinely while taking the glass from the hand of her admirer, and holding it to her beautiful lips. The suddenness of the proposal somewhat startled the young lady, but she neither withdrew her arm, nor ran away; she only held down her head and smiled—she had not known him long enough to blush. And when he eagerly inquired if he might be permitted to hope, she said, "he might ask her pa."

From "The Bloxhams and Mayfields."

THE ENGLISH RADICAL AND THE AMERICAN CITIZEN.

The dinner was profuse and excellent—the first the Bloxhams had eaten at a private house since their arrival. Mrs. Bloxham, however, carefully abstained from tasting of any article peculiarly American, and she also endeavoured to prevent her children from doing so—telling them these strange things might disagree with them.

"Why, ma," said Horne Tooke, "you let us eat all sorts of strange things at the Spread Eagle."

"That was to give you an opportunity of satisfying your curiosity. But they did you a great deal of harm."

"When and how?" persisted the boy. "How were we the worse for them, and what harm did they do us? Tell me that. You can't say we were one moment sick—any of us."

His mother endeavoured to silence him; but his father tried to laugh, and said—

"Mrs. B., you'd better let young hopeful alone. You'll find him too hard for you."

"He's worse than ever since he came to America," murmured Mrs. Bloxham.

"A clever lad, sir," continued Bloxham, turning to Mr. Mayfield—"a clever lad, as you may easily perceive. He'll make a figure in the world yet. You'll have him legislating for you in your House of Congress before fifteen years; and helping to guide, with tongue of fire, the restless ruder of your government."

"Tell me why," persisted Horne Tooke, still addressing his mother—"tell me why we were allowed to eat squashes, and sweet potatoes, and pot-pie, and pumpkin-pudding, and everything on the table, when we were at the Spread Eagle."

"Horne Tooke, my boy," said Mr. Bloxham, "you are certainly sharp enough to understand that when we are at an inn, and a public table, where we pay all the same eat or no eat, it is advisable to indulge ourselves with everything that is to be had; so as to be quite sure of getting the worth of our money. You know we did the same on board of ship. Now some of the passengers were always complaining of the length of the voyage; but I always laughed, and said—I did not care if it lasted two months, as long as we were on the captain's keep. Ha, ha, ha—that's me exactly—there's nothing like having the full worth of one's money."

"But here in this house we pay no money at all," said Horne Tooke, "and that is better still. Ma, I know very well what you are at. You want us to hate everything in America; and so you're afraid to let us eat any more of their nice victuals."

"The child does not know what he's talking about," said Mrs. Bloxham.

"Yes I do," said Horne Tooke; "pa says I always have my wits about me. I know I am the brightest of the family—the only bright one, too."

"Mr. B.," said his wife, "I told you it would be so. There's something in the air of this country that is not fit for English children. It makes them rude, and saucy, and unbiddable, from the moment they set their feet on the land of liberty, as you call it."

"Why, I was just as bad at home," said Horne Tooke, "and I dare say a great deal worse; for I had not half such good times."

Dinner was at length over; and as they adjourned to the front parlour, Bloxham whispered to his wife, "This squire is a capital fellow—I never sat down to a better feed."

"Be quiet," said Mrs. Bloxham, "some of the family may hear you."

In the cool of the afternoon, Mr. Mayfield showed his guests round the farm; and the Bloxham children were made free of the two peach orchards; having previously made themselves so in the forenoon. Bloxham seemed to look about, but in reality saw nothing; for his whole attention was engrossed by hearing himself relate paltry and scandalous anecdotes of the king and queen, with laudatory digressions on Fox, Sheridan, and the Duke of Bedford; talking of all these distinguished men as familiarly as "maids of thirteen do of puppy-dogs." He even hinted, that through his intimacy with Sheridan he was no stranger to the Prince of Wales, whom he praised without measure, as a noble, generous fellow, that was always in debt, and whose feelings went entirely with the people; the said people being all bursting with impatience for the time to arrive when he should begin to reign over them.

"You know, of course," continued Bloxham, "that the prince is in the opposition. The heir apparent always is. I can assure you, sir, (and I have had private opportunities of knowing,) his royal highness (heaven bless him) is a republican at heart; a thorough democrat."

"That is strange," observed Mr. Mayfield; "it is certainly not his business to be so."

"Then the greater the patriotism," pursued Bloxham—"To see how his royal highness goes to the balls of untitled persons; and how agreeable he makes himself to ladies that are plain Miss and Mrs.; even asking them to dance. Yes, yes; he carries in his heart's core the hammer that is to strike off the grinding chains of king-ridden England."

In the mean time, Mrs. Bloxham was walking with Mrs. Mayfield, and entertaining her with accounts of the vast superiority of everything in England to everything in America. As an episode, she introduced a minute description of the Lord Mayor's show, a spectacle which her son, Horne Tooke, (who followed close behind,) averred was nothing in comparison to Bartlemy fair, and not half so productive of fun as Guy Faux day.

The tea-table went on much in the same manner as the dinner-table; except that the children followed the example of Horne Tooke, and helped themselves voraciously to cakes, honey, and sweet-meats; their mother no longer essaying to check them.

From "Leonilla Lynmore."

THE FORTUNE-TELLER.

RUTH RAMBO was a large, tall woman, habited in a dingy brown worsted petticoat, and a blue calico long short-gown, in form something like the dresses that, when worn by genteel people, are called tunics. Her grey hair was partially covered by a cross-barred muslin cap, bordered with coarse Dutch lace, similar to that which ladies, who know no better, now dignify with the name of Brussels and Valenciennes. She had very cunning dark eyes, and, though grossly ignorant, possessed considerable shrewdness, combined with the most unblushing assurance.

After taking her seat behind a little old table, and surveying the young ladies from head to foot, she fixed her eyes upon their faces in such a manner, that each imagined the gaze to be directed exclusively to herself, and quailed beneath what they considered its almost supernatural influence. There was a silence, which was at last broken by the weird-woman pronouncing, in a tone of awful solemnity, the monosyllable—"Well."

Merial's courage failed; and she made a sign to the timid Leonilla, who found it necessary to be spokeswoman. "We have come"—said she—"to consult you on the subject of your art—the art which you profess. We have come to hear what are likely to be the chief events of our future lives—in short, to have our fortunes told."

"Ay—now you've got it right"—said the old woman—"I knew, by my art, what your errand was, as soon as I saw you. So now let us proceed to business, for I have no time to lose, and there be them that are waiting for me; but the last shall be first, and the first shall be last. Take off your bonnets, and give to the world all the features of your visards and visages."

They did so; and the sibyl, contracting her brows mysteriously, and looking from the one to the other, slowly uttered—"Fate bids me begin with the least of you"—pointing her finger at Leonilla.

Ruth Rambo then drew from her pocket a marvellous dirty pack of cards, and said, sternly, to our heroine—"How old are you? Woe betide you, if you do not tell me the naked truth."

"I am just sixteen and three months"—replied Leonilla.—"I can have no reason for misrepresenting my age."

"Not yet, may be"—replied the fortune-teller—"but perhaps you may have, when years have gone by, and the stars begin to run round upon their poles. Women that's got beyant twenty, often try to cheat me; but I am an old fox, and can always find them out by my art. Now I see plain enough you're a foreigner."

"Oh! no, indeed, I am not"—exclaimed Leonilla, earnestly.

"There is no cheating me"—said the old woman, with increased solemnity.—"I have set before all the nations of the earth, and I know a foreigner when I see one."

This (after reflecting a moment) the young ladies understood to mean, that Ruth Rambo had told fortunes to strangers from every part of the world.

"I was born in Philadelphia"—said Leonilla—"and have never, in my life, been out of America."

"Well—and what's Philadelphia but foreign parts; foreign to Boston, is not it?"

She then, after shuffling the cards, produced the four queens from the pack, and desired Leonilla to choose one. She chose the queen of diamonds.

"That stands for yourself"—said the fortune-teller. She then went through the tedious process of shuffling the cards nine times over, always desiring Leonilla to cut them; the old woman each time looking at the bottom card. When all the shuffling and cutting was accomplished, the sibyl raised her eyes to the black circle on the ceiling, as if invoking its aid, paused a moment, and then, with practised dexterity, ran rapidly over the whole pack of cards as she held them, with her hands resting on the table.

"That's you"—said she to Leonilla, displaying the queen of diamonds.—"Every card in the pack has its meaning, in all the four corners of the globe, and persons of art can read them as easy as they can read a buk."

"Is it by the vicinity of certain other cards to the queen of diamonds, that you propose to discover what is to happen to me?"—asked Leonilla.

"That's tellings"—replied the old woman.—"Do you suppose I am going to let people into the secret of my arts and sciences? Some goes by coffee-grounds, which is low and vulgar; and some goes by the lines on the parms of your hands, which is nothing but plexity and puzzle-dem; and some goes by the stars and planipos, which is too far off to be certain. But cards is the only true things, as all the best judges can scratify. Besides, who can tell but I have awful powers, holden from them that is seldom seen, but always about, and may be looking at us now."

LEWALD, FANNY,

Is a woman of letters belonging to Berlin. By no means a speculative recluse, she maintains a very marked position in society, cultivating the acquaintance and intimacy of all the celebrities of the day, to whom she is rendered interesting, not only by her reputation as an authoress, but by her conversational powers. She has travelled through various parts of the continent of Europe, with an eye open to every striking object, and a mind filled with enthusiasm for every personage of note;—let it be added, with a pen ready to stamp her impressions.

Fraulien Lewald, as she is called in Germany, began her literary career as a novel-writer; her first two works were "Clementine," and "Jenny;" neither of which made much impression on the public. She then brought out "Diogenes," her third novel, anonymously; it was clever and satirical, and created a sensation altogether unprecedented in Germany in that department of literature. Describing this success, which seems to have been as complete as was that of "Jane Eyre" in England and America, the Editor of the Foreign Quarterly observes:—"This was the more remarkable, as the book made its appearance during a time when political events were of absorbing interest, and especially when the debates of the first Prussian Parliament left the reading public of Berlin little time or attention to bestow on romances. Notwithstanding these disadvantages, the success of "Diogenes" was complete, and much ingenuity was exercised in endeavouring to penetrate into the mystery of the authorship. Almost every distinguished name which could possibly be brought into connexion with a subject of this kind, was successively mentioned as undoubtedly the true one, by some critic or other, though it happened, unluckily, that no two were agreed. On one point, however, our German brethren of the craft were nearly unanimous. Whoever it might be, it could not be a woman,—that point was soon settled. Such firm and vigorous drawing, such keen satire, such strict logical sequence in carrying out the principles of the 'noble romance,' could by no possibility characterize the productions of a writer of the less worthy gender. These gentlemen are, as all who are familiar with German periodical literature will know, especially clever at pointing out, on all occasions, precisely what is, and what is not attainable to genius, which happens to wear in the flesh the mortal garb of a woman, in declaring its precise limits, and pronouncing their authoritative 'thus far shalt thou go, and no farther.'"

However, the secret was at last disclosed, and Fanny Lewald became celebrated as the author of "Diogenes." Her next work was "Italienisches Bilderbuch," (Italian Picture-Book,) published at Berlin in 1847, and soon afterwards reprinted in London. In this work she very judiciously eschews pictures and churches, the usual staple of a traveller's note-book, but tells as much as possible of the country and the people—"of their joys and sorrows, their eating and drinking, their play and their work;" which she has done as far as was possible for a woman and a stranger to become acquainted with them. She was in Rome toward the close of the pontificate of Gregory XVI.: we shall give her opinions of Italy at that period.

She next visited France, and passed there the exciting winter of the Revolution. The result of her observations she gave to the world in a volume, published in 1850, where we see appearing, to use the artist's own idea, as in a "camera obscura," a most wonderful variety of men and women. They pass through her pages with the same unconnectedness as objects do in the aforesaid optical toy; yet the praise cannot be withheld, that they have the natural air, the masterly outline, and the true properties, so pleasing in the pictures of the camera; to demand from Miss Lewald delineations of equal faithfulness and impartiality, would be asking too much; "mechanical powers" only could reach such result. She certainly merits the approbation of the sober-minded, that being in Paris during the topsy-turvy of 1848, she was not infected with the mania of socialism, or any of the extravagances of reform, though appreciating true progress in civil and religious freedom. Besides the works enumerated, she published, in 1849, a novel called "Prince Louis Ferdinand," which has been much commended in the first journals of Europe.

From "Italienisches Bilderbuch."

SOCIAL INTERCOURSE IN ITALY IN 1846.

The best kind of social intercourse, that by which the spiritual life is excited to a higher activity, is only possible in free countries. Everywhere, in Russia as well as in Germany or Italy, people can dine, and dance, and drink, and smoke, and play at cards, and flatter the women.

But these pleasures are not very lasting; they form no bond of union between individuals, and there is no real interest in them for any one who requires something more of his time than that it shall go as fast as possible. The better spirits among us have passed beyond the childish state of mind that could be content with these things, and desire, even in their recreations, a certain earnestness, to which, however, no playful grace or gaiety need be wanting.

The Italians have inherited from past ages the most pleasing and graceful forms of behaviour; they are children of noble birth, well-bred, and accustomed to elegant manners. Had they more of intellectual culture, they would be in a position to develop the highest attractions of social intercourse. But in Italy, the mind, and with it the life of society, has been laid in fetters; and there is, consequently, a something in the manners of the Italian circles that reminds one of their stately but unoccupied palaces, whose dust-covered pictures and furniture, rich as they are, have a mournful and decayed aspect.

In France, the various parties, political, religious, and literary, are brought together by the desire to discuss freely the questions that arise; for a single word spoken will often put an end to a misunderstanding better than whole pamphlets full of controversy; and the variety of opinion that always manifests itself in conversation, opens fresh springs of interest and progress. In Italy, however, such an intellectual movement has been hitherto impossible. It does not want for men, who, with watchful eye and hopeful soul, follow the movements that take place in other countries, and fervently desire them for their own; but they are denied the freedom not only of action, but of word. All society is watched, and this vigilance extends even to foreigners. I have heard it positively asserted that the entertainments of an Italian lady of good family, who receives a great number of strangers, are paid for by the papal court, and that the lady herself is in its service as a spy. A very clever Abate of my acquaintance pointed out to me a certain chevalier, decorated with the highest papal order, who filled the same office; and afterwards, a German friend, long settled in Rome, warned me, for a similar reason, against the Abate himself. Whether any one of the parties really deserved the accusation, is what I had no means of ascertaining; but the mere possibility of being watched by spies, is enough to drive people out of society; and there can be no difficulty in finding spies in a country where every free thought on religion is a heresy, and the betrayal of a heresy is regarded as a service to God.

CONVERSATION IN ROME.

In Italian circles, I have found the conversation very superficial, consisting much of playful and not ungraceful trifling on subjects of traditional gallantry, (from which, by-the-by, the clergy is by no means excluded,) and of the topics of the day, treated much in the style of a court journal. The comings and goings of illustrious personages, the changes in the genealogical calendar, accidents by flood and fire; theatres, singers, and, though last not least, the ballet; these are the points round which conversation perpetually revolves. Now and then one sees a group whispering together on matters of greater importance, and from such a one, there can occasionally be gleaned intelligence not to be found in books or papers, that have to pass under the eye of the censor. I was told, however, that all prohibited books were always to be found with the cardinals, and that they are read a great deal underhand.

It is in some measure the deficiency of material for interesting conversation that, in Rome, compels people to have recourse to poetry and music to fill up tedious intervals, which occur more frequently from its being the custom in many Italian houses to bring no kind of refreshments, no ice, no supper, not so much as water, to the guests.

* * * * *

The middle classes of the Italians, the official persons, and the lower order of the nobility, live in their own circles, and see little of strangers of a similar class. The intercourse amongst the aristocracy of the various nations is more lively, but still seldom passes beyond an invitation to a ball, a box at the opera, or a drive on the Corso. The interior of the domestic circle still remains closed to strangers, and, consequently, a real intimacy of mind with mind scarcely ever takes place; while in general society, all the profounder interests,—social, political, or religious,—are of course intentionally avoided, as likely to lead to forbidden ground.

LOTTERY TABLES.

At night the tables are illuminated, and these lottery-offices remain open till a late hour of the night, when all others have long been closed. Since as little as a penny may be put in, the very poorest have it in their power to venture the hard earnings of the day, in the delusive hope of a vast return. The plan is to draw five numbers out of ninety: the player takes three, and should these three be found amongst the five drawn, he wins the great prize; should there be two, he wins twelve hundred scudi; but one is of no use. The lottery tables are kept open to tempt the people on Sundays and Saints' Days.

"SMORFIA," A DREAM-BOOK ABOUT LOTTERIES.

I could not contain my indignation against the Italian government as I read this book! It is not enough that, from their accursed avarice, they plunder the subjects whom they call their children, and plunge them into the ruin from which it should be their care to preserve them; not enough that, by their rigid censorships, they shut out as far as possible every ray of mental illumination; they must bestow privileges, forsooth, upon books whose only purpose is to promote the more systematic carrying out of this system of plunder, and thicken the darkness of superstition in which the people are enveloped.

Almost every article of merchandize passing between the Italian States is subjected to duty, as if they were foreign countries. The governments remain separate, when the question is of the welfare of the people; but to do them injury, the Italian princes extend to each other the hand of fraternal affection. One cannot in Rome buy a piece of Florentine or Neapolitan silk, without paying a heavy tax; but one may read at every corner, "To-day the Lottery is drawn for Tuscany;" "This day, until midnight, tickets may be purchased for the Lottery of Lucca!" "Last night of the Lottery of Naples!" &c. How the princes of Italy can reconcile these things to their consciences, passes, I must own, my comprehension.

LEWIS, ESTELLE ANNA,

WAS born in Baltimore, Maryland. Her maiden name was Robinson; her father being a native of Cuba, descended from an English and Spanish parentage. She was married, when quite young, to Mr. S. D. Lewis, a lawyer of Brooklyn, Long Island, where she now resides. She began to write at an early age; but her first poetical effort that attracted much attention, was "The Ruins of Palenque," which appeared in "The New World." In 1844, she published a volume of poems, entitled "Records of the Heart," which was very favourably received. In 1846, there appeared in "The Democratic Review," a poem in three cantos, by Mrs. Lewis, entitled "The Broken Heart;" this, like her former poems, was much admired. In 1848, she published "The Child of the Sea, and other Poems," which, by some critics, has been considered her best work. It is her longest poem, and has passages of exceeding beauty and deep pathos; her power in delineating passion and describing character is very great, and her versification always harmonious and suited to the subject. All her poems show uncommon versatility of imagination, a warm enthusiasm, and remarkable facility of expression. She has written a number of fugitive pieces for different periodicals; one of these, "The Forsaken," has often been quoted for its mournful and tender beauty. Another poem, "The Cruise of Aureana, an Allegory," which we give, is an original and beautiful production. Mrs. Lewis is at present engaged in an epic poem in the Spenserian measure.

From "Child of the Sea."

BEAUTY.

Now smiling, gentle, timid as the dove;
Fair, fresh as flower just culled from vernal grove;
Her long, loose, sable tresses flowing back
Over her marble neck and bodice black;
Crossed on her softly throbbing breast her hands
Before the youth GONZALO's daughter stands.
Oh beauty! who can paint thy magic charm
Upon the heart that glows all fresh and warm?
Man may resign the pen, and well eschew
What Angels never would attempt to do.
Thy smile is light from Heaven's bright Censer sent
To clothe the forms for those blest regions meant—
Thy sway, in either world, omnipotent!

SORROW.

Oh sorrow! where on earth hast thou not sped
Thy fatal arrows! on what lovely head
Hast thou not poured, alas! thy bitter phial,
And cast some shadow on the Spirit's dial!
Why, why, hast thou selected Woman's heart,
To be the mark for thy unerring dart?
It is too sweet, too lovely, pure a thing,
To feel the smart of thy envenomed sting—
But Eve first drained thy cup in Paradise—
And well her daughters pay th' irrevocable price!

From "The Broken Heart"

WOMAN'S LOVE.

Kind Father! frown not on this tale
Of woman's love and woman's woe,
For love is woman's bane and bale,
And woman's Paradise below;—
Yes! Love is manna sent from Heaven
To feed the weary, famished Heart,
That through the desert waste is driven
Of this Life's cold and selfish mart;—
It is the magnet of the Mind,
Where turns the compass of the Soul,
Which way soever blows the wind,
However high the billows roll—
A bright ray of the Deity,
That over sunless chaos burst,
Lighting all space eternally,
Still blissful, bounteous as at first—
The Loadstar of both Heaven and earth—
Created ere Creation's birth.

MY STUDY.

This is my World — my Angel-guarded Shrine,
Which I have made to suit my heart's great need,
When Sorrow dooms it overmuch to bleed;
Or, when aweary and athirst I pine
For genial showers, and sustenance divine;
When soft illusive Hopes my heart deceive,
And I would sit me down alone to grieve —
My mind to sad, or studious mood resign
Here oft upon the stream of Thought I lie,
Floating whichever way the waves are flowing —
Sometimes along the Banks of Childhood going,
Where all is bud, and bloom, and melody
Or, wafted by some stronger current, glide
Where darker frowns the steeps, and deeper flows the Tide

THE LOVERS.

They met, and looked into each other's eyes;
In hers, as in a mirror clear, he saw
A paradise, and she in his beheld
A bright and sunny world, where her pure soul
Could only light, and life, and joyance find;
But th' serpent came between them; then,
Like thunder-riven rocks, apart they dwelt,
Silent, and cold, and withering, until
Their hearts were dead, and they went to the grave,
Their misery to each other unrevealed.

THE CRUISE OF AUREANA.

AN ALLEGORY.

When not a breath bespoke a gale,
And fair and blithely blew the breeze,
I weighed my anchor, trimmed my sail,
And spread it for Elysian seas.

Onward I sailed by many a realm,
And many a spicy-breathing isle,
With Cupid only at the helm —
My star and compass, Psyche's smile.

The sea-maids by my shallop tripped,
Drinking of my inebriate bliss;
Old Neptune, rising briny-lipped,
Upon my brow impressed a kiss.

The warblers piped from hills and dells,
To greet me as I neared the strands;
The lilies rung their snowy bells,
The wood-nymphs clapped their pearly hands.

Around me hung th' enamoured hours —
From airy rifts that oped above me,
White fingers dropped celestial flowers —
The very stars did seem to love me.

And my ecstatic pulse did play
To silvery feet of roseate blisses,
That danced around my soul, which lay
Feeding upon ærial kisses.

Anon a sound came out from under
The wave, and smote my slumbering ear:
A voice croaked out, like muttering thunder: —
"Beware! thou helpless mariner!"

Oh! swift the tempest strode the sky,
And stretched its wings from pole to pole;
Then bending low, with flashing eye,
Hung o'er me like an angry soul.

Down bore it on me fierce and fast,
But still I trusted to my Pilot
To guide me safe before the blast,
And land me on some happy islet.

I heard the breakers roar ahead —
I felt my little vessel shudder —
I called my Pilot — He had sped —
A Fiend was standing at the rudder

"Fear not, thou trembling mariner!"
With adder glance, the Demon said;
"Tis but the howling blast ye hear,
The breakers — they are far ahead.

"Fear not, thou trembling mariner!
Be not thy lip and cheek so pale;
Thy shallop safely I will steer,
And we shall soon outride the gale

Fear not; these moorings well I've tried,
And many a frail, dismasted barque
Have guided safely o'er this tide,
'Mid mist and murk — by day and dark."

Then, loud as trump of Time, I heard
The Storm-Fiend ring his awful laram;
And then a whirlpool's jaws we neared —
It was the Marè Tenchrarum.

Dark rocks on rocks lay piled to Heaven,
Midway their front an archway yawned,
Through which the struggling waves were driven
Into the boiling Hell beyond.

Black as Plutonian midnight, there
Stood Fate, the dread portcullis lifting; —
And downward if any a ruin rare —
Heart-freighted argosy — went drifting.

Virtue, with snowy pinions brailed —
Envy, with rankling venom bloated —
Beauty, with all her charms unveiled,
Like drift-wood down the rapid floated

Now round and round my shallop whirled,
Then struggling lay as in a spasm;
I shrieked — the gloating Demon curled
His lip, and pointed to the chasm.

I grasped the helm — and though too late,
Spurned back the Fiend's exulting glance;
I called on Heaven — I called on Fate —
They silent left me to my chance.

And now my barque, like frightened steed,
Back from the hissing portal wheeled —
Now forward leaped, with lightning's speed —
Now downward like a drunkard reeled.

Gasping it lay: with ruthless arm,
The whirlpool clove its sides asunder,
An Angel clasped my sinking form —
The Demon and the boat went under!

LIND, JENNY,

THE sweet singer, who has won the world by her goodness no less than by her genius, was born in the city of Stockholm, in the parish of St. Clara, in which church she was baptized, about the year 1822. "Her parents,* though not in affluent circumstances, are (for they still live to rejoice in the wonderful success of their beloved daughter) much respected by all who know them. Her father is a member of the legal profession. Her mother for many years kept a boarding-school for girls. By a former marriage, she had a daughter, who died before reaching adult age. Jenny Lind is her only child by second marriage. Both parents are Protestants, and are members of one of the churches in Stockholm. In the same church, the subject of this notice made her first communion, according to the practice of the Lutheran church, the National Church of Sweden, and of all other Scandinavian countries. Of the same church she has continued a member since her fifteenth or sixteenth year.

"From childhood she displayed a remarkable talent for music, and was encouraged by her friends to cultivate her extraordinary powers. In her ninth or tenth year, she attracted the attention of an old teacher of music, named Croelius, who proved to be a true friend. He secured for her the friendship of Count Pucke, the administrator of the Royal theatre in Stockholm, who admitted her to the musical school attached to that theatre, where she made rapid progress. At the early age of fifteen, she commenced singing in public, and became a great favourite with the music-loving people of that city. But it was not long before her voice failed, and she had to give up the stage. Years of disappointment passed away, during which she aided her mother in her school. At length her voice began to return, and her hopes revived.

* We quote from the Sketch of the Life and Character of Jenny Lind, written by the Rev. Dr. Baird.

"The good old Croelius now advocated her going to Paris, where she spent portions of 1841-42, enjoying the tuition of Garcia, the greatest musical teacher in that city. Her efforts were unceasing to master thoroughly the principles of the science, and to improve and perfect her voice.

"Those who suppose she owes all to nature, know but little of the immense labour which she bestowed for many long years upon the acquisition of the principles of music, and the perfecting of her voice—which recovered in time all its early sweetness and beauty, and acquired its present astonishing flexibility and strength.

"In the winter of 1843-44, she commenced in Berlin her wonderful career as a public singer, and soon acquired great celebrity in Germany. In the summer of 1844, she returned to Stockholm, where she was received with unbounded demonstrations of affection and of honour. And without going into a minute account of her musical tours on the Continent, it is sufficient to say, that after having repeatedly visited Vienna, Berlin, Copenhagen, Stockholm, and other cities in the Teutonic portions of the Continent, she appeared in England in the spring of 1847. During that summer and two succeeding ones, she sang in London, and most of the chief places in Great Britain and Ireland. Everywhere her triumph was complete. Each succeeding year her popularity became, if possible, greater.

"At first, and for several years, Miss Lind sang in the theatres,—in the great operas of Meyerbeer, Donizetti, Verdi, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Rossini, etc.,—and was scarcely more distinguished for her singing than her acting. Since the year 1849, she has preferred to sing in concerts, in which she can get away from many things in theatrical performances—for which she has long had an increasing repugnance—and lay out her strength upon the choice morceaux of the best operas, such as the Sonnambula, Norma, Der Freyschutz, Camp of Silesia, La Figlia del Regimento, Ernani, Don Giovanni, etc. This course enables her to introduce the beautiful national songs of Sweden, in which her inimitable powers appear to as great advantage as in the most scientific pieces. By pursuing this course, she is enabled to control with more ease her own movements, and command with more certainty the company which she would prefer. It is probable that this course she will exclusively pursue, as long as she continues to sing in public. These concerts, regulated as she will have them regulated, together with some of the best Oratorios, evidently furnish what her purity of heart and of life pefers and demands; nor can she desire greater success than she has found in this course."

Many reports have been circulated respecting the intended marriage of Miss Lind, while in England; M. Rosenberg, in his biographical sketch, gives the following, we doubt not, correct account of the origin of these rumours. "When Jenny Lind first came to London, she was introduced to Mrs. Grote, the wife of the Member of Parliament, and soon became excessively intimate with her. Shortly after, the brother of this lady returned from Sweden, where, as we believe, he had been for several years engaged in mercantile pursuits. The name of this gentleman was Harris or Harries. He, necessarily, also became intimate with Jenny Lind, and this the more readily from his long residence in her country, and his probably being one of the few English who spoke her own native tongue. From this circumstance arose the report that she was actually engaged to him. Such currency, indeed, did it have, that at one time, when she left England for France, it was said that she had broken off the marriage with him, and had agreed to pay him £10,000 to release her from her promise. We need not say that this report was destitute of the slightest foundation; this being the more evident from her continued friendship for Mrs. Grote, who could scarcely have retained her intimacy with Jenny had such an occurrence taken place on her part towards her own brother."

Early in the year 1850, Miss Lind made an engagement with Mr. Barnum, an American citizen, to visit the New World, and allow the people of the great republic the enjoyment of listening to her voice. Miss Lind was to sing one hundred and fifty nights, under Mr. Barnum's direction, for which she was to receive $150,000, and half the actual profits of every concert, in addition to this stated salary of $1000 per night. Moreover, Miss Lind was accompanied by a female friend, a secretary, and two servants; a composer and pianist, M. Benedict, at a salary of $25,000, was provided to assist her, and the barytone, Giovanni Belletti, was also engaged, at a salary of $12,500: all expenses of the voyage from Europe, travelling and personal in America, of this whole party, were to be defrayed by Mr. Barnum. It was obvious that something like half a million of dollars would be the amount of expenses incurred for the engagement; and that Mr. Barnum would suffer a large loss, was, in Europe, confidently predicted.

Miss Lind reached New York, September 2, 1850. The welcome given her, expressive of the enthusiasm which the fame of her genius and her beautiful character as a woman had excited in America, was such as all the royalty of the Old World could not have elicited. Her first appearance before an American audience was at Castle Garden, September 11; about five thousand persons were present; the receipts amounted to nearly $30,000, of which about $10,000 belonged to Miss Lind, as her portion of the nett profits. Of course, Mr. Barnum obtained an equal amount. Not only was the certainty of her triumphs in America made sure, but also the profitable success of his undertaking was established.

It is not possible to give here the sketch of her artistic progress through the United States; Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Richmond, Charleston, she visited; thence went to Havana; and returned in February, 1851, to New Orleans, where her triumphs of Song exceeded, if possible, any she had before attained. One predominant trait in Miss Lind's character is her benevolence, and this, as some insinuate, has contributed greatly to her popularity. It is strange other great artists do not "affect this virtue if they have it not," if it would so surely lead to fortune. The truth is, the sweet singer has shown, from the opening of her career, the same thoughtfulness for the poor and unfortunate. Miss Bremer, in her brief notice of Miss Lind, says that on the return of this gifted and noble girl from her first successful tour in Germany, she sent through the papers of Stockholm an address to the public, stating that "as she once more had the happiness to be in her native land, she would be glad to sing again to her countrymen, and that the income of the opera, in which she was for the season to appear, would be devoted to raise a fund for a school where élèves for the theatre would be educated to virtue and knowledge." Christian Andersen, one of the most distinguished men in Sweden, in his reminiscences tells a similar tale of Jenny Lind. He says: "she is happy, belonging no longer to the world. Yet she loves art with her whole soul. She feels her vocation. Her noble and pious disposition cannot be spoiled by homage. On one occasion only, in my hearing, did she express joy and self-consciousness in her talent. It was during her last stay at Copenhagen. Every evening she appeared either at the concerts or in opera. She heard of a society, the object of which was to take unfortunate children out of the hands of their parents, by whom they were compelled to beg or steal, and place them in better circumstances. Benevolent people subscribed annually for their support, yet the means for this excellent purpose were but small. 'I have an evening disengaged,' said she: 'I will give a performance for these poor children, but we must have double prices.' Such a performance was given, and returned large proceeds. When she heard the amount, her countenance lit up, and tears filled her eyes. 'It is beautiful,' said she, 'that I can sing so.'"

It is stated that, while performing in Germany, she gave away no less a sum than 30,000 florins; and Rev. Dr. Baird, whom we have before quoted, says, "it is said, on what we believe to be good authority, that during Miss Lind's visits to England, nearly sixty thousand pounds sterling, or not much short of three hundred thousand dollars, were secured for objects of charity in that country by her efforts."

Since she came to America, she has distributed to charitable societies, in the various cities she has visited, probably not less than fifty thousand dollars; the whole profits of her first concert, viz. $10,000, she gave to be thus distributed in the city of New York. Yet she has a nobler, because more necessary work of charity planned. Having already made a liberal, though not extravagant provision for her own future support, as well as for the support of her honoured parents who reside in Sweden, she is now desirous of appropriating the avails of her visit to America to promote education among the poor of her native land. The sketch of Miss Bremer* contains some statistics which will make more apparent the extreme need of schools for the children, and Bibles for the adult population of Sweden. Ignorance and vice, in Protestant countries, are darker and more brutalizing than in Papal lands. God bless this effort of a daughter of Sweden to give light to her benighted country! We agree with Dr. Baird, that it is to be regretted she has given away any of her profits here. America is rich enough; we have no poor as poverty is understood in Europe, and the people who relieved starving Ireland, and receive and give support to thousands on thousands of the pauper emigrants from the Old World, ought not to permit this generous woman to leave any gift of money among them! No—let us rather form societies here to aid her in her glorious plan of establishing a system of free education for the children of Sweden.

We have dwelt on the goodness of Jenny Lind, because it is the trait which hallows her genius. The greatest endowment of the mind is not so heavenly as the least manifestation of true charity in the heart; and that the soul of this sweet singer is warm with pious feelings, is the charm of her voice. No description could explain its power. That it has held thousands on thousands spell-bound—that it has, wherever heard, moved the multitude to admiration, and been so richly rewarded as to enable her to give away the vast sums we have recorded—these things are its most expressive praise.

LYNCH, ANNE CHARLOTTE,

Was born at Bennington, Vermont. Her father, who died when she was a child, was one of the United Irishmen, and implicated in the same unfortunate rebellion with Robert Emmett. He was banished from Ireland, and, with several of his fellow-sufferers, came to America, where he married the daughter of an officer in the Revolutionary army. After her father's death, Miss Lynch removed with her widowed mother to New York, where she has since resided. Her poetical talents were developed early, and her first efforts attracted favourable attention; all her subsequent writings show the continual progress, both in grace of expression, and power and depth of thought, that mark an original mind. Her effusions, both in prose and poetry, have generally appeared in the popular periodicals and annuals of the day. In 1849, she collected some of her poems in a volume, which was illustrated by several of our finest artists, making it altogether one of the most favourable specimens of the genius and taste of our female literature. Her writings are as remarkable for their purity and high-toned morality, as for their feminine grace and feeling. Her kindly and social sympathies, and the love of communion with superior minds, felt by all intellectual people, have induced her to make her mother's house the gathering-place for the literati or distinguished persons in New York, thus filling, with graceful hospitality, a position still left unoccupied in our other large cities, and adding one more to the numerous attractions of the metropolis of the Empire State.

LOVE.

Go forth in life, oh, friend! not seeking love,
A mendicant that with imploring eye
And outstretched hand asks of the passers-by
The alms his strong necessities may move.
For such poor love, to pity near allied,
Thy generous spirit may not stoop and wait,
A suppliant whose prayer may be denied
Like a spurned beggar's at a palace-gate:
But thy heart's affluence lavish uncontrolled —
The largess of thy love give full and free,
As monarchs in their progress scatter gold;
And be thy heart like the exhaustless sea,
That must its wealth of cloud and dew bestow,
Though tributary streams or ebb or flow.

JEALOUSY.

Ah no! my love knows no vain jealousy:
The rose that blooms and lives but in the sun,
Asks not what other flowers he shines upon,
If he but shine on her. Enough for me
Thus in thy light to dwell, and thus to share
The sunshine of thy smile with all things fair.
I know thou'rt vowed to Beauty, not to Love:
I would not stay thy footsteps from one shrine,
Nor would I bind thee by a sigh to mine.
For me — I have no lingering wish to rove;
For though I worship all things fair, like thee,
Of outward grace, of soul-nobility,
Happier than thou, I find them all in one,
And I would worship at thy shrine alone!

FAITH.

Securely cabined in the ship below,
Through darkness and through storm I cross the sea,
A pathless wilderness of waves to me:
But yet I do not fear, because I know
That he who guides the good ship o'er that waste
Sees in the stars her shining pathway traced.

Blindfold I walk this life's bewildering maze,
Up flinty steep, through frozen mountain pass,
Through thorn-set barren and through deep morass
But strong in faith I tread the uneven ways,
And bare my head unshrinking to the blast,
Because my Father's arm is round me cast;
And if the way seems rough, I only clasp
The hand that leads me with a firmer grasp.

ASPIRATION.

The planted seed, consigned to common earth,
Disdains to moulder with the baser clay,
But rises up to meet the light of day,
Spreads all its leaves, and flowers, and tendrils forth;
And, bathed and ripened in the genial ray,
Pours out its perfume on the wandering gales,
Till in that fragrant breath its life exhales.
So this immortal germ within my breast
Would strive to pierce the dull, dark clod of sense;
With aspirations, winged and intense,
Would so stretch upward, in its tireless quest,
To meet the Central Soul, its source, its rest:
So in the fragrance of the immortal flower,
High thoughts and noble deeds, its life it would outpour.

THE HONEY-BEE.

The honey-bee that wanders all day long
The field, the woodland, and the garden o'er,
To gather in her fragrant winter store,
Humming in calm content her quiet song,
Seeks not alone the rose's glowing breast,
The lily's dainty cup, the violet's lips —
But from all rank and noxious weeds she sips
The single drop of sweetness closely prest
Within the poison chalice. Thus if we Seek only to draw forth the hidden sweet
In all the varied human flowers we meet,
In the wide garden of humanity,
And, like the bee, if home the spoil we bear,
Hived in our hearts it turns to nectar there

BONES IN THE DESERT.

Where pilgrims seek the Prophet's tomb
Across the Arabian waste,
Upon the ever-shifting sands
A fearful path is traced.

Far up to the horizon's verge,
The traveller sees it rise —
A line of ghastly bones that bleach
Beneath those burning skies.

Across it, tempest and simoom
The desert-sands have strewn,
But still that line of spectral white
For ever is renewed.

For while along that burning track
The caravans move on,
Still do the way-worn pilgrims fall
Ere yet the shrine be won.

There the tired camel lays him down
And shuts his gentle eyes;
And there the fiery rider droops,
Toward Mecca looks, and dies.

They fall unheeded from the ranks:
On sweeps the endless train;
But there, to mark the desert path,
Their whitening bones remain.

As thus I read the mournful tale
Upon the traveller's page,
I thought how like the march of life
Is this sad pilgrimage.

For every heart hath some fair dream,
Some object unattained,
And far off in the distance lies
Some Mecca to be gained.

But beauty, manhood, love, and power,
Go in their morning down,
And longing eyes and outstretched arms
Tell of the goal unwon.

The mighty caravan of life
Above their dust may sweep,
Nor shout nor trampling feet shall break
The rest of those who sleep.

Oh, fountains that I have not reached,
That gush far off e'en now,
When shall I quench my spirit's thirst
Where your sweet waters flow!

Oh, Mecca of my lifelong dreams,
Cloud palaces that rise
In that far distance pierced by hope,
When will ye greet mine eyes!

The shadows lengthen toward the east
From the declining sun,
And the pilgrim, as ye still recede,
Sighs for the journey done!

A THOUGHT BY THE SEA-SHORE.

Bury me by the sea.
When on my heart the hand of Death is prest,
If the soul lingereth ere she join the blest,
And haunts awhile her clay,
Then mid the forest shades I would not lie,
For the green leaves like me would droop and die

Nor mid the homes of men,
The haunts of busy life, would I be laid:
There ever was I lone, and my vexed shade
Would sleep unquiet then;
The surging tide of life might overwhelm
The shadowy boundaries of the silent realm.

No sculptured marble pile
To bear my name be reared upon my breast—
Beneath its weight my free soul would not rest,
But let the blue sky smile,
The changeless stars look lovingly on me,
And let me sleep beside this sounding sea:

This ever-beating heart
Of the great Universe! here would the soul
Plume her soiled pinions for the final goal,
Ere she should thence depart—
Here would she fit her for the high abode—
Here by the sea, she would be nearer God.

I feel his presence now:
Thou mightiest of his vassals, as I stand
And watch beside thee on the sparkling sand,
Thy crested billows bow;
And as thy solemn chant swells through the air,
My spirit, awed, joins in thy ceaseless prayer.

Life's fitful fever o'er,
Here then would I repose, majestic sea;
E'en now faint glimpses of eternity
Come o'er me on thy shore:
My thoughts from thee to highest themes are given,
As thy deep distant blue is lost in Heaven.

LYSER, CAROLINE LEONHARDT,

Was born in 1814, in Zittau, and removed in 1832 to Dresden, where she was married to the author and painter, John Peter Lysér. In 1839, she made her débüt at Nuremberg as an Improvisatrice, where she was received with enthusiastic applause; she afterwards appeared with the same success in many other large cities of Germany. She wrote "The Chaplet of Songs" in 1834, "Characteristics for German Women and Girls" in 1838, "Master Durer," a drama, in 1840, and many novelettes. In 1850, she published an annual, called "The Gift of Autumn." None of her works have been translated into English; but in Germany her songs are very popular.

M.

MARCET, JANE,

An Englishwoman, deservedly distinguished for her great scientific acquirements, and for the usefulness to which she has devoted her extraordinary talents and learning. "With that apologetic air which modest science is wont to assume in her communications with ignorance," Mrs. Marcet offered her first work, "Conversations on Chemistry," to the English public, about the year 1810. No work on science in the English language, we might almost say in the world, has been more useful in imparting its knowledge. Its clear elucidation, and its admirably simple method, have undoubtedly contributed, in a great degree, to render chemistry popular in America as well as in England, by presenting the leading facts of this science so plainly illustrated as to be within the reach of ordinary minds.

"Men must be taught as though we taught them not." We women have to bear that in mind, when we find many of the learned spurning the idea of a female philosopher, while the foundation of their own science has been made by the "Conversations on Chemistry," which book has for more than thirty years been the general text-book for young men in Great Britain and in the United States.

Our free school system, enlarging the sphere of education, brings its millions of children and youth into places of public instruction; all these pupils must be furnished with books, and thus a popular work is multiplied by thousands of editions. One of Mrs. Marcet's books—"Conversations on Chemistry"—had passed through a hundred and sixty editions, of 1000 copies each—that is, one hundred and sixty thousand copies had been printed in the United States, some years ago. This copy had been prepared by a gentleman, in whom the public had confidence as an educator. He had endorsed the work by giving his name, at the time much more valued than that of any woman's would have been.

In truth, so small was the faith placed in female capacity, when Mrs. Marcet first sent out her scientific manuals, that her name was believed to be fictitious, and the cognomen of some learned man was required to ensure public favour.

"Give her of the fruit of her hands, and let her own works praise her in the gates," could hardly then be acted on. Those dark ages have gone by in our land. Woman's learning as well as genius, is now proudly acknowledged, and doubtless the useful writings of Mrs. Marcet aided the enlightenment of public sentiment. We owe her a debt of gratitude; and, were justice done her, she would have some substantial testimonial of the benefits her useful pen has conferred on our schools and places of learning, in the multiplied editions of all her works. The man who makes two blades of grass grow where but one had been found, is a public benefactor; what praise does the woman merit who has enriched the harvest of the human mind? When the "Conversations on Political Economy" appeared it gave its author more decided claims to a mind highly cultivated and philosophical than either of the others; but the doctrines discussed have yielded to so many mutations and modifications, that her theory in her own country, and especially in America, now receives nothing more than a partial recognition. Still, the praise is due Mrs. Marcet of being the first writer who made "political economy" popular. Before her work appeared, the science was hidden from the public mind in the huge tomes of dull and dignified authors; now it is a study in our common schools.

Mrs. Marcet's style is an admirable vehicle for her ideas,—clear, vigorous, excellent English; in short, "proper words in their proper places." Her last work is "Conversations on Land and Water."

MARIA II. DA GLORIA DONA,

PRINCESS de Beira and queen of Portugal, was born in Rio de Janeiro, South America, May 3, 1819. Her father, Dom Pedro, was the emperor of Brazil, and on the death of his father, John II., became nominally king of Portugal also, though that country was governed by the Infanta Isabella as regent. In May, 1826, Dom Pedro abdicated the Portuguese throne in favour of his daughter, Maria, (he remaining king during her minority,) on condition of her marrying her uncle, Dom Miguel; but he being a fanatic in religion, and a violent enemy to the constitution Dom Pedro had granted, in short, a bigot and a tyrant, endeavoured, with the aid of Spain, to seize the throne and reign absolute king of Portugal. Dom Pedro invoked the assistance of England in favour of his daughter, the young Maria, and after alternate victories and defeats, the Portuguese nation finally received Dona Maria as their queen in 1833.

Her father, who was regent, died in 1834; but previous to his decease, caused his daughter to be declared of age, though she was then only fifteen years old. He had selected the dukes of Palmella and Terceira to be the leading members of her cabinet. But the young queen soon disagreed with these faithful supporters of her cause in the contest which had only so shortly before been brought to a close, and the Marshal Saldanha, who had placed himself at the head of the more "liberal" or democratical party, became prime minister. It was hoped that this step would tend to render the new government popular with the mass of the people, and to allay the party disputes which had begun to agitate the kingdom. The event was different from what was anticipated. No sooner did Saldanha undertake to control the violence of his friends, than he lost his own popularity, and the agitation in the community became more violent than before. A short time after her accession to the throne, Dona Maria had married the Duke Augustus, of Leuchtenberg, who died in March, 1835. In April, 1836, she was married again to the Duke Ferdinand, of Saxe-Coburg-Cohary. The latter did not make a favourable impression on the Portuguese; and the rejection of the queen's nomination of him to the Cortes, as commander-in-chief of the army, was the occasion of two successive dissolutions of that body, which, in their turn, contributed to aggravate the prevailing discontent. An insurrection at length broke out on the 9th of September, 1836, and the greater portion of the troops passing over to the side of the insurgents, the queen was constrained to dismiss her ministers, and to abrogate the existing constitution of government in favour of that of the year 1822. From November 4th, of this year, the government was entirely controlled by the National Guard of Lisbon, and the clubs. The "chartists," or adherents of the constitutional charter of Dom Pedro, under Saldanha and the duke of Terceira, organized their forces in the north of the kingdom, and threatened the capital. They were obliged to capitulate on the 20th of September, 1837. In the meanwhile, the extraordinary Cortes were assembled to form a new constitution; and they performed their task in a moderate and compromising spirit. Retaining the modes of election, and other democratic elements of the constitution of 1822, they conceded to the queen an unqualified veto in all matters of legislation. A difficulty next arose with England; a new Cortes was chosen, favourable to the views of the more moderate party, and the threatened storm passed over. A difference with Spain, which occurred soon after, was accommodated through the mediation of the British government. The reconciliation of the pope with the court of Lisbon, as well as the acknowledgment of Dona Maria as queen of Portugal by Russia, Prussia and Austria, in 1841, were events that contributed to give stability to her throne.

In the commencement of 1842, the moderados, or moderate party, made an attempt to re-establish the constitution of Dom Pedro, abrogated in 1836, and succeeded, through the co-operation of the troops stationed at Lisbon, on the 10th of February, 1842. A new administration was immediately formed, having at its head the duke of Terceira and Costa Cabral. It aimed to strengthen the alliance of Portugal with England, and to repair the disordered condition of the public finances. The economy that has been observed in the public expenditure, and the imposition of additional taxation, caused several attempts to effect the overthrow of the administration, but they were unsuccessful. An insurrection broke out in February, 1844, in a regiment stationed at Torres Novas, and was not finally suppressed till the end of April, in the same year. Yet, notwithstanding these tumults, Portugal is, on the whole, progressive, and the people are improving. These beneficial changes may be owing more to the goodness of the queen than to her great abilities; but she evidently desires to promote the happiness of her people; she is not a bigot; and the contrast between her character and that of Dom Miguel, should lead the Portuguese to thank Providence that Dona Maria is their sovereign. Her subjects did love her—but she is gone from them; she died Nov. 13th, 1853, aged thirty-four years. In early youth she was beautiful and graceful, later in life she was too corpulent. Her education had been careful and suitable to her rank, and from the day she ascended the throne till her lamented death, the royal household was a model of purity and propriety. She was a true wife, a tender mother, and exemplary in all her duties.

MARIA CHRISTINA,

QUEEN dowager and ex-regent of Spain, daughter of Francisco Genari, king of Naples, was born in 1806. She was of the Bourbon line of princes; consequently, a distant relation of Ferdinand VII., king of Spain, to whom she was married, December, 1829. Ferdinand was then forty-five years of age, coarse, vulgar, and sensual; he had been married three times, and had treated each of his successive wives with the grossest abuse,—one was even supposed to have died by poison, administered by his hand; his constitution was exhausted by a dissolute life, and his mind, always inferior, had become nearly fatuous. Christina was in the beautiful bloom of youth and health, with a vigorous, though ill-regulated mind, and very captivating manners. It was not possible she could either love or esteem Ferdinand; but who had ever taught her these feelings were required towards her husband? Ambition and policy are the governing motives of royal (and, usually, of aristocratic) marriages. Shall we condemn Christina because she followed the rule of her order? Let us be just; though she doubtless married Ferdinand from selfish motives, she was a much better wife than he deserved, and her influence in annulling the absurd Salic law has been of advantage to the Spanish nation; because had Don Carlos, a fanatic monk, succeeded his brother Ferdinand, the awful horrors of religious despotism and persecutions, worse, far worse, even than their civil wars, would have deluged the country in blood, and stifled the last sigh of freedom.

The reputation of Christina had spread through the kingdom long before her arrival; and on her appearance in Madrid, her youth, beauty, and affability, realized the most sanguine expectations, and filled all Spain with enthusiasm. She studied from the first to make herself popular, and succeeded; she flattered the prejudices of the people, conformed to their usages, and adopted their dress. All this, aided by a countenance beaming with benevolence, and a charming smile which always played about her lips, soon caught the hearts of her subjects.

During her marriage with Ferdinand, she became the mother of two daughters; the present queen of Spain, Isabella II., born October 10, 1830, and Louisa, now wife of the Duke de Montpensier, born January 30, 1832. Through the influence of the queen, Ferdinand was induced, in March, 1830, to revoke the Salic law. The effect of this measure being to deprive the king's brother, Don Carlos, of the succession in favour of Isabella, gave rise to many intrigues during the latter part of Ferdinand's life, and after his death caused a dreadful civil war. During the illness of the king, in the last three years of his life, he appointed the queen regent of the kingdom, and on his death, in September, 1833, he left the regency, during the minority of Isabella, to Christina.

The death of the king was the signal for a war, which burst out at once in all parts of Spain. The country was almost equally divided between the adherents of Don Carlos, called Carlists, and the supporters of Isabella II., called Christinos, from the regent. After changing her ministers several times, Christina attempted to govern the kingdom without sharing her authority with any representative assembly. Finding herself unsuccessful in this, she appointed two ministers successively, who were to give a more popular form to the government. But the dissatisfaction still continuing, Maria Christina was forced, by a military insurrection at La Granja, where she was residing, on the 13th of April, 1836, to issue a decree, pledging herself to adopt the constitution of 1812, with such modifications as the Cortes might agree to. But afterwards, when the Cortes enacted the law of the "ayuntamientos," limiting the powers of the municipalities of the kingdom, it met with so much opposition, that it was found impossible to execute it. Maria Christina, in her perplexity, confided to Espartero, who was exceedingly popular, the formation of a new ministry. Espartero required her consent to the repeal of the obnoxious law, the dissolution of the existing Cortes, and the removal from her person of certain individuals. Unwilling to comply with these conditions, and unable otherwise to carry on the government longer, she resigned the regency, and retired into France, in October, 1840. Her husband, Munoz, for she had married her favourite, and the children she had by him, accompanied her. Munoz had been originally a private in the king's guard, and even during the king's life, Christina had received him to her confidence, and bestowed on him wealth and rank. There are also rumours and reports current, accusing her of illicit intercourse with this man while Ferdinand was living.

In a popular work,* written by an American, these charges are reiterated, and also that both Isabella and Louisa belonged to Munoz. But a few pages further on, the author, apparently forgetting these assertions, remarks of the young queen, that "her father (Ferdinand) was one of the most worthless wretches who ever disgraced a throne;" and afterwards says, that Isabella "bears a marked resemblance to the portraits of Ferdinand VI."—which is somewhat remarkable, if she is the child of Munoz. In the same work, detailing the scandalous quarrels of Christina with the adherents of Don Carlos, even during the dying scene of Ferdinand VI., it is asserted that "the robust child, Louisa, came rushing from the nursery, and, with puny fist and more formidable tooth and nail, played a conspicuous part in the peril of the fray."

Louisa was born January 30, 1832. Ferdinand died September 29, 1833, when this child was just twenty months old. If she could then aid her friends so effectually, it is no wonder the astute Louis Philippe desired to secure such a prodigy of female heroism for the advancement of his ambitious plans. Seriously, this story is so palpably false, that it need only be fairly stated to refute itself. We allude to it here, to show how little dependence is to be placed on the thousand slanderous reports put in circulation by the British press, (pity an American should ever adopt them,) concerning Christina. Her great crime is, that she preferred the French to the English alliance, and has been endeavouring, during her regency, and through her influence over Isabella, to free Spain from its dependence on the latter power.

Is Christina wrong in this? Does not every State and people, who experience British rule or British alliance, feel too heavy for endurance the weight of its sovereignty, and the waste of its selfishness? Let miserable Ireland, plundered India, bankrupt Jamaica, and opium-poisoned China, reply. In Napier's "History of the Peninsular War," the author, though a Briton, acknowledges the selfish policy of the English government in regard to Spain. He owns that the British army destroyed the manufactories of cotton and woollen goods which fell in their way; and which the French had spared. The Spanish manufactories have never recovered from this destructive policy of manufacturing England, then the dear ally of Spain.

Maria Christina is a woman of vigorous mind and far-seeing policy. She made Isabella queen; she sustained her on the throne; is it likely that she has been plotting to make this daughter's married life miserable? Had Christina been as wicked as the English press represents her, and desired to place Louisa on the throne, she would have found the means to do it,—following the example of a Spanish king. That Christina, who returned to Madrid in 1845, used her influence to prevent the marriage of Isabella with a Coburg, and to prevail on her to wed a Bourbon, is no doubt true; but this was done to thwart England and benefit Spain, where her children were to rule, and not to tyrannize over her daughter.

Nor have the courts of Europe any right to point the finger of scorn at Christina, because she places her children by Munoz among the nobility of Spain; some of the highest among England's titled families are descended from the illegitimate children of their kings.

We are not vindicating the character of Christina because of examples of royal profligacy; if she has sinned, she should suffer; but vile accusations, or opprobrious epithets, unsupported by any evidence of guilt, are to be classed as slanders, which we do not choose to embody in our Record.

MARSH, ANNE,

Was born in Staffordshire, England. Her father, James Caldwell, Esq., was Recorder of the borough of Newcastle-under-Line, and also Deputy Lieutenant of the county of Stafford. He was not a magistrate, because, being in principle a dissenter, he refused to qualify by an oath of adherence to the Established Church of England; yet he was highly esteemed, and was a man of remarkable abilities. His fourth daughter was Anne Caldwell, now Mrs. Marsh, who, in talents and character, strikingly resembles her father, and does honour to the careful education he bestowed upon her.

The paternal care and tenderness Mrs. Marsh had experienced, may have had some influence on the manner of her first appearance in authorship. She took, as is well known, the pseudonyme of "An Old Man;" but she is by no means to be confounded with those authoresses who, of late, have abdicated the feminine appellation, together with the delicacy and decorum which are its appropriate boast. Her first production, "The Old Man's Tales," was published in 1837, and was soon followed by "Woods and Fields;" both works were simple in construction and affecting in their catastrophes, and both deeply moved the public heart to sympathize with these sad creations of genius. The power of the writer was universally acknowledged; though the influence of such works on morals was regretted by the class who believe these representations of volcanic passion are never salutary. Her next work was "The Triumphs of Time;" followed, at short intervals, by "Mount Sorel," "Emily Wyndham," "Norman's Bridge," and "Angela,"—her best work, on the whole, and one of which any female writer might be proud. "Mordaunt Hall," which has been highly esteemed, succeeded; then "The Wilmingtons," and "Lettice Arnold," a sweet, simple story; also "The Second Part of the Previsions of Lady Evelyn." And, moreover, Mrs. Marsh has written "The History of the Protestant Reformation in France," and "Tales of the First Revolution," translated and altered from the French.

* Abbott's Kings and Queens

The author of the first of this series of imaginative works was, of course, supposed to belong to the masculine gender; but the truth was not long concealed. Mrs. Marsh's writings are most essentially feminine; none but a woman could have penned them. That gushing spring of tenderness was never placed in a man's bosom; or, if it were, it would have been dried up by passion, or frozen by mingling with the selfish current of out-of-door life, long before the age of book-making had arrived. Mrs. Marsh has a peculiar gift of the pathetic; for the most part, it is difficult to read her stories without tears. You may criticise these stories; you may point out incongruities, errors of style and of language; yet they have a mastery over your feelings; they cause emotions which you cannot control—and this is the power of genius, ay, genius itself. Her tender epithets and prodigal use of "pet names" may be censured; few writers could so constantly indulge themselves in this way without taking the fatal "step" into the "ridiculous," which is never to be redeemed. But no candid reader can ever accuse Mrs. Marsh of affectation; she writes spontaneously, and it is evident she throws herself into the situations she describes, and pours out the overflowings of a mind of deep sensibility and tenderness.

Without cramming the reader with "morality in doses," Mrs. Marsh never lets an occasion pass for enforcing truth and virtue; her works are pervaded by a spirit of gentle piety, and benevolence is evidently a strong principle in her nature. Her later productions, though not so painfully interesting as the two first, show more knowledge, judgment, and right discipline of mind; yet one fault, which belongs to many female novelists, may be noted—too many characters and too many incidents are crowded in each work. Still, "Angela" is one of the most charming pictures of disinterested, struggling virtue, English literature can boast; and this work and "Mordaunt Hall" have obtained the notice and eulogiums of the most eminent French critics.

Mrs. Marsh is very happy in delineations of rural scenery; she revels in describing parks and gardens; these pictures are, probably, idealized. Such hues of beauty so justly blended; such streams and shades; such summer terraces and poetic groves, might, perhaps, be sought in vain through "Merry England." But it is the province of the fine arts to embellish; we go to them for relaxation from the carking cares of life; and this poetic prose may, very legitimately, offer us "a brighter landscape than the world e'er knew."

From "Angela."

WOMAN'S INFLUENCE.

How much influence woman exercises in society! They need not busy and bestir themselves to increase it; the responsibility under which they lie is heavy enough as it is.

It is a trite remark, this; but I wish that all women could be brought conscientiously to reflect, as some few of them certainly do, upon the account they shall be able to render for the power they do, or might have exercised.

To say nothing of that brief but despotic sway which every woman possesses over the man in love with her—a power immense, unaccountable, invaluable; but in general so evanescent^{as} as but to make a brilliant episode in the tale of life—how almost immeasurable is the influence exercised by wives, sisters, friends, and, most of all, by mothers!

Upon the mother, most of all, the destiny of the man, so far as human means are to be regarded, depends. Fearful responsibility! and by too many mothers how carelessly; how thoughtlessly, how frivolously, how almost wickedly, is the obligation discharged. How carelessly, at the very outset, is the young child left in the nursery, abandoned to the management and training of, at best, an ignorant, inefficient nurse; or too often, far, far worse, to an unprincipled or interested one! From these imperfect influences, to say the very best of them, at times assisted by those of the footman, groom, and other inhabitants of the stable-yard, to be at once handed over to the chance direction of a school—chance direction, I say, for in the very best of schools so much must necessarily depend upon chance—upon chances of observation upon the part of the master—chance companions—chance temptations—chance impressions—that without a most serious and correct attention to the guiding influences from home, the boy is left exposed to all sorts of false directions, some of which it is almost certain he will follow. Thus he grows up to be a man, imperfect and contradictory; his moral character unformed—his aspirations ill-directed—his temper undisciplined—his principles unsettled. He enters life an ill-trained steed; and the best that can be hoped for him is, that the severe lash of disappointment, contradiction, and suffering, will, during the course of his career, supply the omissions of his youth, and train him at last, through much enduring, to that point from which a good education would have started him.

EMPLOYMENT.

Let a lady provide herself with active and useful employment to fill up a large portion of every day, and feed and enlarge her mind by reading books worth reading during the other; and let her read with selection, and select with care. At all events, if she choose to employ her time in reading without selection, let her not think she is employing herself well.

From "The Wilmingtons."

A SAD SPECTACLE.

The poor sufferer died in doubt, irresolution, and ill-defined terrors, as she had lived.

She was a believer without a strengthening faith; amiable and affectionate, without self-devotion and courage; sensible of her defects, repentant, and contrite, without power to correct, or effort to amend.

Her life had been like a confused skein of delicate and valuable thread, tangled for want of careful development. She came to the end of it, and all was still confusion, and all useless in spite of its adaptation to so many fine purposes; and may those in danger of the same waste of existence, for want of courage to meet its demands and defy its pains,—and they are many,—pause upon the slight sketch of this ineffectual character. Forbear to sigh, for sighs are weakness, but brace up the feeble knees, and endeavour to amend.

A NARROW MIND.

Mrs. Vernon was a very excellent woman, in that form of excellence which was the result of the strict but somewhat narrow education of many years ago. She thought justly, but she judged rigidly. She was ready to make every personal sacrifice to duty herself, but she was too fond to impose her own notions of duty upon others. She was sympathetic and kind where she understood the sentiment before her, but she was cold, and almost pitiless, to sorrow of which she could not appreciate the cause; and what she could not understand was sure to appear to her unreasonable. She was enthusiastic in her love of the excellence which she comprehended, but some of the finer forms of excellence she did not comprehend. Then, she had not a shadow of indulgence for the frailties of our nature. Every thing took a positive form with her, for good or bad. She had not breadth of understanding sufficient to take in the whole of a matter, and strike the balance of equity between contending qualities.

From "Mordaunt Hall."

AN ENGLISH GARDEN.

A beautiful garden it was, the sun brightly shining, and every thing around breathing freshness and sweetness. She passed through the arched walk amid the thick shrubberies, which led to the fine gardens of Mordaunt Hall.

The walls were lofty, and covered with fruit-trees; and the beds, laid out in fine symmetrical order, were filled with rows of vegetables in prodigious abundance, growing with a luxuriance and in a profusion that showed neither pains nor expense was spared upon their cultivation. The area of two acres thus occupied was traversed each way by a broad gravel-walk, on either side of which were beds filled with gay, but common, flowers; with knots of roses from distance to distance, alternating with honeysuckles, all cut in low, round bushes. The bloom of these was gone, but there was no deficiency, as yet, of gay coloring; for rich tufts of China asters, purple and pink convolvuluses, African marigolds, sun-flowers, purple phlox, and, in short, an abundance of those common though autumn flowers, of which I, old man as I am, find myself, from association, so fond, were growing there. Opposite to the door at which she entered, the long line of forcing-houses was glittering in the morning sun. There were vines, loaded with purple and amber bunches of fruit growing in inexhaustible profusion; while the crimson peaches and green and purple figs, in their full ripeness, were peeping temptingly among their leaves. The abundance of every thing around was so great, that it was evidently impossible that the family could consume one half of what was thus produced; and, in spite of the calls upon Penny's stores, resulting from the recent wedding-day, over-ripe fruit strewed the ground unheeded, while peas and bean-stalks, still loaded, were blackening and yellowing in the sun; and vegetables running on all sides to waste.

This prodigality of wealth was, however, the only thing that at all militated, to the judicious eye, against the pleasure afforded by the spectacle of these fine, well-ordered gardens.

The dew hung sparkling upon the leaves and flowers, the sun shone reflected from a plashing fountain, that played in the middle of a small pond in the centre of the garden, where the walks crossed. The sweet smell of the plants, the fresh, pure air of the morning playing upon her cheek, and the early birds hopping about, and along the walks, saluting her with their cheerful carols and chirpings, filled her with a sensation of unusual delight, as Alice opened for her the garden door.

THE CHRISTIAN.

He who walks with God, who lives in his presence, whose mind is filled with the image of wisdom far above human wisdom, goodness far above human goodness, justice to which a last appeal may be made, and with whom justice will ever be found—he who sees his beauty in this garb of external nature, so exquisite an exposition of the Divine mind; for, shattered and disordered as it is by some evidently external force, enough remains to prove the beauty, grace, and order of the unblemished original—he who does this lives in a new element. His thoughts, his imagination, his views, are purified and elevated.

SIN AND ITS CONSEQUENCES.

Oh, vice is a hideous thing!

A hideous, dark mystery—the mystery of iniquity! Its secret springs are hidden from our view, but its more obvious causes and consequences are palpable and demonstrable; and it is with its consequences, in our narrow circle of knowledge, that we alone should attempt to deal.

Many subtle and questioning intellects perplex themselves with the inquiry, Whence the remote, original cause of the sin and evil around us, and why?—a question it is not given to any man, under the condition of our present existence, to answer; but scarcely any one sufficiently fixes his attention upon that which it is our main business to know, and which we can know: the efficient causes, and more especially the consequences, of sin.

Oh, if we steadily kept our minds alive to this most important subject of thought; if men, before they did evil, would only remember its inevitable results; if all the wide-extended sufferings, the sorrows, the pains, the tears, inevitably following upon wrong, were but present to the wrong-doer at the moment of his crime, it is scarcely possible that heart of flesh could resist the piteous picture; that heart of man but must turn appalled from the criminal course upon which he was about to enter.

But we are selfish, careless, unreflecting, blinded by inclination and passion, or by that darkness worse than death which attends upon the slothful indifference to questions of right and wrong. Men pass from day to day, yielding to the temptations of covetousness or pleasure, thoughtless of consequences to themselves in many cases, almost utterly insensible as regards the results to others.

The true moral painter's part it is to hold up a faithful picture to the heart of the long succession of evils which from one crime spring.

SEDUCTION.

The crime of which Ridley had been guilty, he, like many of his sex, regarded very lightly: it was but a silly girl betrayed. He did not estimate—how could such a heart as his estimate?—the vast sum of misery included in that small sentence.

The long agonies of a woman's heart, whose affections have been disappointed by the carelessness with which men in ordinary society give rise, by their attentions, to feelings which are the legitimate and natural return of such attentions, is a very serious breach of the law of doing as we would desire to be done by; a breach upon which they, most of them, never reflect at all: but light is this indeed to the crime here perpetrated.

A man should be forced to look steadily into the gulf of despair—or far, far, far worse—of degradation and moral ruin into which, for the gratification of the idlest vanity or licentious passion, he plunges a young, innocent, trusting creature, whose only error, it may be, was to love him too well. Men, if they would reflect, must and would shudder and turn aghast from the horrid, horrid spectacle!

But they will not reflect, they will not learn to shudder; the subject is painful, and they pass it from their mind, with a few wicked common-places, at which they are too ready. Ridley's treachery was double-dyed in wickedness; but had he not carried his deceit so far—had his victim been a more easy prey, would her fate have been less cruel? As for the fathers, mothers, sisters, brothers, of those thus led to folly, no one, of course, thinks of them. No man, the slave of his own vices, can be expected to cast a thought upon them; the sum of their misery is never even calculated—the figures are not even set down.

And the children!

Reflect upon that; varnish it over as you may, provide for them handsomely if you will, one reflection, at least, make: "What are to be the moral impressions of a child whose being sprang from a parent's sin?" I ask you only to think of the dark confusion of affections and principles, on the hardness and indifference, or both, which must be the result. Did Ridley, intelligent, reflecting, a weigher of things, a deep searcher into metaphysical and moral truths, a man with at least all the intellectual elements which ought to form a great man—did Ridley ever trouble himself once to consider these things, things so nearly connected with his own and with another's soul?

No, certainly.

His was an imagination—ah, were mine as bright!—that might have painted to him, in living images, all the consequences of his criminal self-indulgence and most wicked treachery. His mind had power, had it possessed the will, to draw with the pencil of Dante, the appalling picture of that inner hell to which he had condemned the being he pretended to love—once had loved. And the poor father!—the agonies of the gentle, unoffending man, who had welcomed him so hospitably under his lowly roof; whose heart was so full of kind affections, so free from guile, or jealousy, or pride! Yes, Ridley possessed power to have pictured in a way my feeble hand vainly attempts to do, the long death of the soul, the awful dark despair, of a father wounded in a daughter's honour.

A parent disgraced in his own loving, innocent child. He shall render a heavier account for all this, because he is great, and gifted, and wise, and powerful, and fitted to guide a state and rule the interests of a nation—he shall be the less forgiven, because in the plenitude of his powers he has chosen to step aside to crush a poor little insect in its humble path—he shall be the less forgiven, because the wider the knowledge, and the higher the intellect, and the larger the observation, so much the greater is the power of estimating the claims and appreciating the sufferings of whatever breathes; and that the thoughtless cruelty which we lament and pardon in the untutored child, is odious, is execrable in the man!

ILLEGITIMACY.

Nothing can compensate to any child the simple fact meeting us at the outset, that of belonging to parents not legally and inseparably united.

This is no evil created, as some have perhaps been led to think, by the artificial arrangements and conventions of man in society; its source is in nature—in that nature, the Author of which made marriage coeval with the creation of man; healthfully to rear the precious plant wherein lies the hidden germ of eternity, requires the element of home—and marriage is the foundation of home. Wherever or howsoever the sacredness of marriage is not revered, depend upon it, there the man will ever be found imperfectly developed.

The legitimate orphan child, be he who he may, or where he may, has one great advantage with which he starts in life: his place is marked; he is to set out from the place occupied by his parents. Every well-meaning friend has at once a sort of measure given him as to how he ought to be treated and how educated. Every indifferent person understands this, acquiesces in and supports it. But how different is the case of the unhappy natural child!—his place is undefined; he has literally none in society; he is the sport of the caprice, the prejudices, the carelessly adopted notions, of every one with whom he has to do. By some he will be pitied, as most unfortunate; by others almost loathed, as tainted and degraded by the vices to which he owed his being. One is for elevating him to the rank and treating him as belonging to that of the best-endowed of his parents; another for sinking him almost below the level of the lowest. What one does for him another undoes; the kind consideration of one but renders him more susceptible to the unkindness and contempt of others. He has not even the memory of a parent to cheer his poor solitary heart—that sacred memory so cherished, so sacred, which consoles while it hallows and elevates the soul of the orphan. He cannot even aspire to purify himself, without inflicting a wound upon that deep piety of the heart, that foundation-stone of the great infinite of piety, the reverence of the child for its parent.

Mystery of iniquity! Trailing serpent, endless involutions of the consequences of sin!

MARTINEAU, HARRIET,

BORN in 1802, was one of the youngest of a family of eight children. Her father was proprietor of one of the manufactories of Norwich, in which place his family, originally of French origin, had resided since the revocation of the edict of Nantes. Miss Martineau has herself ascribed her taste for literary pursuits to the delicacy of her health in childhood, and to her deafness, which, without being complete, has obliged her to seek occupations and pleasures within herself; and also to the affection which subsisted between her and her brother, the Rev. James Martineau. When her family became unfortunate in worldly affairs, she was able, by her writings, to relieve them entirely from the burden of her support, and she has since realized "an elegant sufficiency" from her writings.

Her first work, "Devotional Exercises, for the use of Young Persons," was published in 1823. The following year, appeared "Christmas Day;" and in 1825, "The Friends," being a sequel of the last named. In 1826, she wrote "Principle and Practice," a tale, "The Rioters," and "Original Hymns." In 1827, "Mary Campbell" and "The Turnout" were published; and in 1829, "Sequel to Principle and Practice," "Tracts for Houlston," and "My Servant Rachel." In 1830, appeared her best work, because evincing more tenderness of feeling and faith in religion than any other she has written,—this was "Traditions of Palestine;" also a prize essay, "The Essential Faith of the Universal Church," and "Five Years of Youth." In the following year, 1831, she obtained prizes for two essays, "The Faith, as unfolded by Many Prophets," and "Providence, as manifested through Israel."

Miss Martineau seems here to have reached her culminating point in religious sentiment; her faith never rose above sentiment, except in the "Traditions of Palestine," which has passages of, seemingly, true and holy fervour of spirit. In 1832, she commenced her series of tales, as "Illustrations of Political Economy," "Illustrations of Taxation," of "Poor Laws," &c. Miss Martineau was induced to prepare these books, from reading Mrs. Marcet's "Conversations on Political Economy," and thinking that illustrations through stories, theory put in action, would be most effective in producing reforms. The books were very popular when they appeared; but we doubt if their influence on the public mind was productive of any beneficial improvement. The tales were read for amusement; the political notions were forgotten, probably, before the incidents of the story had been effaced by some newer work of fiction.

In 1835, she visited the United States, where she had many friends, warm admirers of her talents, and of the philanthropy with which her writings was imbued. She was welcomed as a sister; and throughout her "Tour in America," the kindest hospitality of the American people was lavished on her. She published the result of her observations and reflections in 1837. She found what she came to find, and no more. Her philosophical and political opinions were fully formed before she set her foot on American ground, and her two works, "Society in America" and "Retrospect of Western Travel," are essentially a bundle of facts and deductions, to prove that Harriet Martineau's opinions were right. But she brought to these investigations some excellent qualities and much benevolent feeling. She was earnest, enthusiastic and hopeful; her books, though marred by many mistakes, some misrepresentations, and, of course, with absurd and erroneous deductions drawn from wrong premises, were yet far more candid in tone and true in spirit, than any preceding works of British travellers in America had ever been. The style is spirited, graphic, and frequently eloquent. Miss Martineau is remarkable for her power of portraying what she sees; she revels in the beauties of landscape, and has a wonderful command of language. Her writings are usually entertaining, even to those who do not agree with her in theory and sentiment.

Of her subsequent writings, we will quote the opinion of an eminent British critic.* "Her first regular novel appeared in 1839, and was entitled 'Deerbrook.' Though improbable in many of its incidents, this work abounds in eloquent and striking passages. The democratic opinions of the authoress (for in all but her anti-Malthusian doctrines, Miss Martineau is a sort of female Godwin) are strikingly brought forward, and the characters are well drawn. 'Deerbrook' is a story of English domestic life. The next effort of Miss Martineau was in the historical romance. 'The Hour and the Man,' 1840, is a novel or romance, founded on the history of the brave Toussaint L'Ouverture, and with this man as hero, Miss Martineau exhibits as the hour of action the period when the slaves of St. Domingo threw off the yoke of slavery. There is much passionate as well as graceful writing in this tale; its greatest defect is, that there is too much disquisition, and too little connected or regular fable. Among the other works of Miss Martineau are several for children, as 'The Peasant and the Prince,' 'The Settlers at Home,' 'How to Observe,' &c. Her latest work, 'Life in the Sick-Room, or Essays by an Invalid,' 1844, contains many interesting and pleasing sketches, full of acute and delicate thought and elegant description."

In 1846, Miss Martineau, in company with intelligent friends, made a journey through Egypt, to Palestine, Greece, Syria, and Arabia. She has given her impressions of those countries in her work, "Eastern Life; Present and Past," published in 1848. That she is an intelligent traveller, and knows "how to observe," better than almost any tourist who had preceded her, there is no doubt. Her work is exceedingly interesting; but it is marred by the mocking infidelity which she allows for the first time to darken her pages, and testify to the world her disbelief in divine revelation!

A new work from the pen of Miss Martineau, "Letters on Man's Nature and Developments," has lately appeared in London; it is decidedly atheistic in its tone; the only foundation of morality, the belief in God, is disavowed, and His holy word derided as a book of fables, unworthy the study of rational beings. There is something in this avowal by a woman of utter unbelief in Christianity which so shocks the mind, that we are troubled to discuss it; we draw back, as from a pit of destruction, into which to gaze, even, is to sin.

In commenting on this infidel work, an American critic, after paying a high compliment to the great talents of Miss Martineau, even allowing she has "masculine power and activity of mind," adds, evidently intending to depreciate the sex, "but the constitutional feebleness, waywardness, and wilfulness of woman is nevertheless not unfrequently evinced by her; and as she grows older the infirmities of her nature are more and more conspicuous." If to become an atheist and avow infidelity be the sign of "feebleness, waywardness," &c., how happens it that the great mass of infidels are men? Miss Martineau must now be ranked with Hume, Gibbon, Shelley, Byron, and a host of eminent masculine writers in Great Britain, besides the greater portion of French savans and German philosophers. Even Milton denied, in his old age, the divinity of the Saviour; a fitting sequence to his elevation of the reason of man above the intuitive goodness of woman. Why is it more shocking for a woman to deny the Saviour, and disbelieve the Bible, than for a man? Is it not because she is the conservator of morals, endowed with a quicker capacity of recognizing or feeling divine truth, and with a nature more in consonance with the requirements of the Gospel? Do men show strength, wisdom, and decision of character, when elevating human reason above divine revelation? The apostle declares that to those who "believe," the Gospel is "the power of God, and the wisdom of God." Four-fifths of these believers are now women. Is not the power and wisdom, which the Christian faith gives, with the female sex?

Miss Martineau has indeed become weak, because she has deserted this tower of strength—"faith in the Lord Jesus Christ;" and bowed down her noble nature to worship reason unenlightened by revelation, an idol set up by the "feebleness, waywardness, and wilfulness" of men. May God give her grace to see and escape the snare of the tempter. The triumph of woman's genius is to follow the Saviour in doing good, to hold fast her faith in God, her hope in a blessed immortality. What higher aim than this can the ingenuity of man devise, or his reason prove beneficial to the human race?

From "How to Observe."
CHRISTIANITY.

It is not by dogmas that Christianity has permanently influenced the mind of Christendom. No creeds are answerable for the moral revolution by which physical has been made to succumb to moral force; by which unfortunates are cherished by virtue of their misfortunes; by which the pursuit of speculative truth has become an object worthy of self-sacrifice. It is the character of Jesus of Nazareth which has wrought to these purposes. Notwithstanding all the obscuration and defilement which that character has sustained from superstition and other corruption, it has availed to these purposes, and must prevail more and more now that it is no longer possible to misrepresent his sayings and conceal his deeds, as was done in the dark ages. In all advancing time, as corruption is surmounted, there are more and more who vividly feel that life does not consist in the abundance that a man possesses, but in energy of spirit, and in a power and habit of self-sacrifice, there are perpetually more and more who discern and live by the persuasion that the pursuit of worldly power and ease is a matter totally apart from the function of Christianity; and this persuasion has not been wrought into activity by declarations of doctrine in any form, but by the spectacle, vivid before the eye of the mind, of the Holy One who declined the sword and the crown, lived without property, and devoted himself to die by violence, in an unparalleled simplicity of duty. The being himself is the mover here; and every great man is, in a similar manner, however inferior may be the degree, a spring by which spirits are moved. By the study of them may much of the consequent movement be understood.

* Chambers' Cyclopædia of English Literature.

OF CELIBACY.

Celibacy of the clergy or of any other class of men involves polygamy, virtual if not avowed, in some other class. To this the relaxation of domestic morals in the higher orders of all Catholic societies bears testimony as strongly as the existence of allowed polygamy in India. It is everywhere professed that Christianity puts an end to polygamy; and so it does, as Christianity is understood in Protestant countries; but a glance at the state of morals in countries where celibacy is the religion of the clergy—among the higher ranks in Italy, in France, in Spain—shows that, while the name of polygamy is disclaimed, the thing is held in no great abhorrence. This is mentioned here simply as matter of fact, necessary to our inquiry as to how to observe morals and manners. It is notorious that, wherever celibacy is extensively professed, there is not only, as a consequence, a frequent breach of profession, but a much larger indulgence extended to other classes, in consequence of the restrictions on one.

MARRIAGE.

Marriage exists everywhere, to be studied by the moral observer. He must watch the character of courtships wherever he goes; whether the young lady is negotiated for and promised by her guardians, without having seen her intended, like the poor girl who, when she asked her mother to point out her future husband from among a number of gentlemen, was silenced with the rebuke—"What is that to you?" or whether they are left free to exchange their faith "by flowing stream, through wood, or craggy wild," as in the United States; or whether there is a medium between these two extremes, as in England. He must observe how fate is defied by lovers in various countries. Scotch lovers agree to come together after so many years spent in providing the "plenishing." Irish lovers conclude the business, in case of difficulty, by appearing before the priest the next morning. There is recourse to a balcony and rope-ladder in one country; a steamboat and back-settlement in another; trust and patience in a third; and intermediate flirtations, to pass the time, in a fourth. He must note the degree of worldly ambition which attends marriages, and which may therefore be supposed to stimulate them; how much space the house with two rooms in humble life, and the country-seat and carriages in higher life, occupy in the mind of bride or bridegroom. He must observe whether conjugal infidelity excites horror and rage, or whether it is so much a matter of course as that no jealousy interferes to mar the arrangements of mutual convenience. He must mark whether women are made absolutely the property of their husbands in mind and in estate, or whether the wife is treated more or less professedly as an equal party in the agreement. He must observe whether there is an excluded class, victims to their own superstition or to a false social obligation, wandering about to disturb by their jealousy or licentiousness those whose lot is happier. He must observe whether there are domestic arrangements for home enjoyments, or whether all is planned on the supposition of pleasure lying abroad; whether the reliance is on books, gardens, and play with children, or on the opera, parties, the ale-house, or dances on the green. He must mark whether the ladies are occupied with their household cares in the morning, and the society of their husbands in the evening, or with embroidery and looking out of balconies; with receiving company all day, or gadding abroad; with the library or the nursery; with lovers or with children. In each country, called civilized, he will meet with almost all these varieties; but in each there is such a prevailing character in the aspect of domestic life, that intelligent observation will enable him to decide, without much danger of mistake, as to whether marriage is merely an arrangement of convenience, in accordance with low morals, or a sacred institution, commanding the reverence and affection of a virtuous people.

CHILDREN.

Children in all countries are, as Mrs. Grant or Laggan says, first vegetables, and then they are animals, and then they come to be people; but their way of growing out of one stage into another is as different in different societies as their states of mind when they are grown up. They all have limbs, senses, and intellects; but their growth of heart and mind depends incalculably upon the spirit of the society amid which they are reared. The traveller must study them wherever he meets them. In the country, multitudes of them lie about in the streets, basking in the sun, and killing vermin; while the children of the very poorest persons of another country are decently clothed, and either busily occupied with such domestic employments as they are capable of, or at school, or playing among the rocks, or climbing trees, or crawling about the wooden bridges, without fear of danger. From this one symptom the observer might learn the poverty and idleness of the lower classes of Spain, and the comfort and industry of those of the United States. As to the children of the richer classes, there is the widest difference in the world between those who are the idols of their mothers (as in societies where the heart's love is lavished on the children which has not been engaged by the husband), and those who are early steeped in corruption (as in slave countries), and those who are reared philosophers and saints, and those to whom home is a sunny paradise hedged round with love and care, and those who are little men and women of the world from the time they can walk alone. All these kinds of children exist, sure breathings of the moral atmosphere of their homes.

From "Deerbrook."

LOVE AND HAPPINESS.

There needs no other proof that happiness is the most wholesome moral atmosphere, and that in which the immortality of man is destined ultimately to thrive, than the elevation of soul, the religious aspiration, which attends the first assurance, the first sober certainty of true love. There is much of this religious aspiration amidst all warmth of virtuous affections. There is a vivid love of God in the child that lays its cheek against the cheek of its mother, and clasps its arms about her neck. God is thanked (perhaps unconsciously) for the brightness of his earth, on summer evenings, when a brother and sister, who have long been parted, pour out their heart-stores to each other, and feel their course of thought brightening as it runs. When the aged parent hears of the honours his children have won, or looks round upon their innocent faces as the glory of his decline, his mind reverts to Him who in them prescribed the purpose of his life, and bestowed its grace. But religious as is the mood of every good affection, none is so devotional as that of love, especially so called. The soul is then the very temple of adoration, of faith, of holy purity, of heroism, of charity. At such a moment, the human creature shoots up into an angel; there is nothing on earth too defiled for its charity—nothing in hell too appalling for its heroism—nothing in heaven too glorious for its sympathy. Strengthened, sustained, vivified by that most mysterious power, union with another spirit, it feels itself set well forth on the way of victory over evil, sent out conquering and to conquer.

From "Eastern Life," &c.

A SCENE ON THE NILE.

It was a curious scene,—the appearing of the dusky natives on all the rocks around; the eager zeal of those who made themselves our guards, holding us by the arms, as if we were going to jail, and scarcely permitting us to set our feet to the ground, lest we should fall; and the daring plunges and divings of man or boy, to obtain our admiration or our baksheesh. A boy would come riding down a slope of roaring water, as confidently as I would ride down a sand-hill on my ass. Their arms, in their fighting method of swimming, go round like the spokes of a wheel. Grinning boys popped in the currents; and little seven-year-old savages must haul at the ropes, or ply their little poles when the kandjia approached a spike of rock, or dive to thrust their shoulders between its keel and any sunken obstacle; and after every such feat they would pop up their dripping heads, and cry, "Baksheesh." I felt the great peculiarity of this day to be my seeing, for the first, and probably for the only time of my life, the perfection of savage faculty; and truly it is an imposing sight. The quickness of movement and apprehension, the strength and suppleness of frame, and the power of experience in all concerned this day, contrasted strangely with images of the book-worm and the professional man at home, who can scarcely use their own limbs and senses, or conceive of any control over external realities. I always thought, in America, and I always shall think, that the finest specimens of human development I have ever seen, are in the United States, where every man, however learned and meditative, can ride, drive, keep his own horse, and roof his own dwelling; and every woman, however intellectual, can do, if necessary, all the work of her own house. At home I had seen one extreme of power, in the helpless beings whose prerogative lies wholly in the world of ideas; here I saw the other, where the dominion was wholly over the power of outward nature; and I must say, I as heartily wished for the introduction of some good bodily education at home, as for intellectual enlightenment here.

McINTOSH, MARIA JANE,

Is a native of Georgia. She was born at Sunbury, a village about forty miles south of Savannah, and received all the education which she derived from schools at an academy in her native place. In 1835, Miss McIntosh removed to the city of New York, where she has since resided. Her first printed work, "Blind Alice," was published by Mr. Newman, in December, 1840. It was followed, at various intervals, by the other tales, known as Aunt Kitty's, which appeared in the following order:—"Jessie Grahame," "Florence Arnott," "Grace and Clara," and "Ellen Leslie;" the last being published in 1842. "Conquest and Self-Conquest," "Woman an Enigma," "Praise and Principle," and a little tale called "The Cousins," were published by the Messrs. Harper; the first in 1843, the last in 1846. In 1847, the Messrs. Appleton published for Miss McIntosh, "Two Lives, or to seem and to be;" and since that time they have brought out "Aunt Kitty's Tales," collected into one volume and carefully revised, "Charms and Counter-Charms," and "Woman in America—her Work and her Reward." In 1850, appeared her work, entitled "The Christmas Guest," intended as a book for the holidays.

In all Miss McIntosh's writings, there are evidences of originality and freshness of mind, as well as of good judgment and sound religious principle. In her two longer tales, she has displayed unusual power in depicting the passions and interesting the feelings. In her work on woman, she has shown herself to be one who thinks and judges for herself, uninfluenced and undisturbed by the clamour of conflicting opinions; and there have been few books on that much-canvassed topic which show so much sound common sense, as well as thought and earnestness. Her style is easy and graceful, and her first object is evidently the maintenance of pure morality and religion.

From "Woman in America," &c.

WOMAN'S WORK.

But while all the outward machinery of government, the body, the thews and sinews of society, are man's, woman, if true to her own not less important or less sacred mission, controls its vital principle. Unseen herself, working like nature in secret, she regulates its pulsations, and sends forth from its heart, in pure and temperate flow, the life-giving current. It is hers to warm into life the earliest germs of thought and feeling in the infant mind, to watch the first dawning of light upon the awakening soul, to aid the first faint struggles of the clay-encumbered spirit to grasp the beautiful realities which here and there present themselves amid the glittering falsities of earth, and to guide its first tottering steps into the paths of peace. And who does not feel how her warm affections and quick irrepressible sympathies fit her for this labour of love? As the young immortal advances in his career, he comes to need a severer discipline, and man, with his unconceding reason, and stern resolve, becomes his teacher. Yet think not that woman's work is done when the child has passed into the youth, and the youth into the man. Still, as disease lays his hand heavily upon the strong frame, and sorrow wrings the proud heart of man, she, "the help-meet," if faithful to her allotted work, is at his side, teaching him to bend to the storms of life, that he may not be broken by them; humbly stooping herself, that she may remove from his path every "stone of stumbling," and gently leading him onward and upward to a Divine Consoler, with whose blessed ministrings the necessities of a more timid spirit, and a feeblér physical organization, have made her familiar.

THE MOTHER'S POWER.

Look at the young immortal as it lies so fresh and fair within your arms, the purity of heaven on its brow, and nothing of earth within its heart but the love with which it leaps to the sound of the mother-voice and the tender smile of the mother-eyes; in that little being, scarce yet conscious of existence, are enfolded powers to bless or to curse, extended as the universe, enduring as eternity. The hand which now clings so feebly, yet so tenaciously, to your own, may uphold or overthrow an empire—the voice, whose weak cry scarce wins the attention of any but a mother's ear, may one day stir a nation's heart, and give the first impulse to actions which will hasten or retard for ages the world's millennial glories. And will you, nay, dare you, strive to compress these powers to the dimensions of a drawing-room, and to present its paltry triumphs as the highest reward of their exercises?

THE DAUGHTER'S DESTINY.

The daughter whose bounding step and joyous prattle make the music of your home—shall she walk through the world's dark and troubled ways, an angel of charity, blessing and blessed, warming into life by her cordial sympathies, all those pure, unselfish affections, by which we know our selves allied to heaven, but which fade, and too often die in the atmosphere of earth?—shall "her path be as that of the just, shining more and more unto the perfect day," and shall she pass at length gently, serenely, with peace in her soul, from her earthly home to that fairer home above, of which she has made it no unworthy type?—or, shall she be the belle of one, two, or it may be, three seasons, nurturing in herself and others the baleful passions of envy and hate, of impurity and pride?

* * * * *

And has woman at the South nothing to do in promoting this "consummation most devoutly to be wished?" It must be mainly her work. Let her place it before her as an object of her life. Let her improve every gift and cultivate every grace, that the increased influence thus obtained may aid in its accomplishment. Let her light so shine, that it may enlighten all who come within her sphere. Let her be a teacher of the ignorant, a guide to the straying of her own household. Let her make it a law of the social life in which she rules, that nothing so surely degrades a man as idleness, and the vices to which it almost inevitably leads. Thus will she proclaim the dignity and worth of labour, and she will find her reward in the new impress made on the yet ductile minds of her children. She has seen them hitherto too often go forth, like bright and wandering stars, into a life containing for them no definite object. In this vast void, she has seen them too often driven hither and thither by their own reckless impulses; and her heart has been wrung, and her imploring cry has arisen to Heaven for God's restraining grace, as they have seemed about to rush into the unfathomable realm of night. With almost Spartan heroism she has offered her "Te Deums," as again and again the sound has come up to her from the battle-field of life, "Mother! all is lost, but honour!" But labour will tame these wild impulses—will give to life a decided aim; and, as the strong hand, loosed from the bonds of prejudice, obeys the command of the stout heart, her "peans" will be sounded, not for defeat nobly sustained, but for victory won. We have placed before her, her work and her reward.

MITCHELL, MARIA,

Is the daughter of William and Lydia C. Mitchell, descendants of the earlier settlers of Nantucket Island, in the state of Massachusetts, and members of the Society of Friends, or Quakers. Mrs. Mitchell descended from the same stock with Dr. Franklin, whose mother was from this island; and it is quite remarkable, that throughout this family lineage are to be traced some of those traits of character which, in full measure, marked the character and history of that distinguished philosopher. The mother of Miss Mitchell was much distinguished, in her youth, for her fondness for books.

Of these parents Miss Maria was the third child, born August 1, 1818. At a very early age she busied herself in writing tales for her brothers and sisters, and other juvenile friends, printing them with her pen, and binding them in the form of books. Some of these little productions were very ingenious, and would have done honour to maturer years.

From her mother and an excellent preceptress she received the first rudiments of her education, and at the age of eleven entered her father's school, alternately as student and assistant teacher. To the study and practice of astronomy her father was a devotee. Whenever the duties of life permitted, the whole man was engrossed with the pursuit. Without instruments at that period, or the means of procuring any, he contemplated the heavens as a shepherd, watching the motions of the firmament, and investigating its laws by his own resources. It is said that his love of the study originated in observing, in very early life, the phenomenon of the harvest moon, and in attempting to search out the cause before he knew that it had been done by others. Later in life he became possessed of instruments, and engaged in practical operations; and Miss Maria, who had already distinguished herself in mathematical learning, was employed as assistant in the observatory.

The onerous duties of a mere assistant in an establishment of this kind are scarcely calculated to attach one to the employment, yet Miss Mitchell was enamoured of the prospect of observing by herself, and commenced her career by obtaining altitudes of the heavenly bodies, for the determination of the local time. The instrument thus used was the sextant, one of the most difficult of the observatory. Mastering this, she engaged in the study of the science; and familiarizing herself with all the instruments, she became skilful in their use.

From this period she pursued with zeal the study of the firmament, devoting much time to the examination of nebulae, and sweeping for comets, often exposing herself to the elements in the most inclement seasons. Nothing can exceed her diligence and industry—not in the departments of science merely, but in the domestic relations of life. Her good sense never suffers her to neglect the latter in the prosecution of the former. It is related of her, that while very young she was in the habit of carrying constantly in her pocket bits of linen cloth, to wrap up the fingers of her brothers when wounded,—and to this day she is the doctress of the family.

On the 1st of October, 1847, she discovered a telescopic comet, for which she obtained the gold medal of the king of Denmark, an interesting account of which has been written by Hon. Edward Everett, late President of Harvard University.

Miss Mitchell calculated the elements of this comet, and communicated a memoir on the subject to the Smithsonian Institute. She has been for some time engaged with her father in making the necessary astronomical observations for the mensuration of an arc of the meridian between Nantucket and Portland, in the employment of Dr. Bache, for the coast survey. At the invitation of the superintendent, she also made some observations at the northern extremity of this arc. She is also engaged in the computations of the new Nantucket Almanac, authorized by the government of the United States, and under the superintendence of Lieutenant Davis. Amidst all these employments, she finds time to read many of the French and German mathematical writers, and to keep up with the literature of the day. She has been elected a member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, the only lady having that honour, and subsequently, on the nomination of Professor Agassiz, a member of the American Association for the Promotion of Science.

To know the distinguished honour reflected on our countrywoman, we must know her competitors. Miss Mitchell made her discovery of the planet on the 1st of October, 1847.

On the 3d of October, the same comet was seen at half-past seven, P. M., at Rome, by Father de Vico, and information of the fact was immediately communicated by him to Professor Schumacher, at Altona. On the 7th of October, at twenty minutes past nine, P. M., it was observed by Mr. W. R. Dawes, at Camden Lodge, Cranbrook, Kent, in England, and on the 11th it was seen by Madame Rümker, the wife of the Director of the Observatory at Hamburg. Mr. Schumacher, in announcing this last discovery, observes:—"Madame Rümker has for several years been on the look-out for comets, and her persevering industry seemed at last about to be rewarded, when a letter was received from Father de Vico, addressed to the editor of the Astronomische Nachrichten, from which it appeared that the same comet had been observed by him on the 3d instant, at Rome."

MITFORD, MARY RUSSELL,

Was born on the 16th of December, 1786, at Abresford, in Hampshire, England. Her father was of an old Northumberland family, one of the Mitfords of Mitford Castle; her mother the only daughter of the Rev. Dr. Russell of Ash, in Hampshire, and she was their only child. When still a young girl, about the year 1806, Miss Mitford published a volume of miscellaneous poems, and two volumes of narrative poetry after the manner of Scott, "Christina the Maid of the South Seas," (founded upon the story of the mutineers of the Bounty, afterwards taken by Lord Byron;) and "Blanche, a Spanish Story." These books sold well and obtained a fair share of popularity, and some of them were reprinted in America. However, Miss Mitford herself was not satisfied with them, and for several of the following years devoted herself to reading instead of writing; indeed it is doubtful whether she would ever have written again had not she, with her parents, been reduced from the high affluence to which they were born to comparative poverty. Filial affection induced her to resume the pen she had so long thrown aside, and accordingly she wrote the series of papers which afterwards formed the first volume of "Our Village, Sketches of Rural Character and Scenery," about 1820. But so little was the peculiar and original excellence of her descriptions understood at first, that, after being rejected by the more important publications, they at last saw the light in the English "Lady's Magazine." The public were not long in discovering the beauties of a style so fresh yet so finished, and in appreciating the delicate humour and the simple pathos of these tales; and the result was, that the popularity of these sketches outgrew that of the works of a loftier order from the same pen; and every nook and corner of the cluster of cottages around Three-Mile-Cross, near Reading, in Berkshire, (in one of which the authoress herself resides,) is as well known as the streets and lanes around the reader's own home. Four other volumes of sketches were afterwards added; the fifth, and last, in 1832. Extending her observation from the country village to the market-town, Miss Mitford published another interesting volume of descriptions, entitled "Bel-ford Regis." She edited three volumes, called "Stories of American Life by American Writers." She also published a volume of "Country Stories;" a volume of "Dramatic Scenes;" an opera called "Sadak and Kalasrade," and four tragedies, the first entitled "Julian," which was represented at the great London Theatre in 1823, Mr. Macready playing Julian. Her next was "Foscari;" then "Rienzi" and "Charles the First;" all were successful. "Rienzi," in particular, long continued a favourite. She also edited four volumes of "Finden's Tableaux," and is now, after eight years' cessation of writing, engaged on a series of papers called "Readings of Poetry, Old and New," which will probably form two or three volumes, and will soon be published.

Although her tragedies show great intellectual powers, and a highly cultivated mind, yet it is by her sketches of English life that she has obtained the greatest share of her popularity, and it is on them that her fame will chiefly depend. In these descriptions Mary Mitford is unrivalled. She has a manner, natural to her, no doubt, but inimitable and indescribable, which sheds interest around the most homely subjects and coarsest characters. Who ever threw by a sketch of hers half read? No one who admired a spring daisy—or that most fragrant blossom, the wall-flower, which beautifies every object, however rough, rude or ruinous, around which it wreathes. And, though she does not trace the motives of conduct very deeply, or attempt to teach principles of moral duty, yet there is much in her sprightly and warm sketches of simple nature which draws the heart to love the Author of all this beauty; and much in her kind and contented philosophy to promote love and good feelings. She is a philanthropist, for she joys in the happiness of others—a patriot, for she draws the people to feel the beauties and blessings which surround the most lowly lot in that "land of proud names and high heroic deeds."

"As a proof that we love her, we love her dog," says an American writer. "Walter Scott's stately Maida is not more an historical character than her springing spaniel, or Italian greyhound. If she began by being prosaic in poetry, she has redeemed herself by being most poetic in pastoral prose."

In 1833 Miss Mitford's name was added to the pension list, a well-earned tribute to one whose genius has been devoted to the honour and embellishment of her country.

WHITSUN-EVE—MY GARDEN.

The pride of my heart and the delight of my eyes is my garden. Our house, which is in dimensions very much like a bird-cage, and might, with almost equal convenience, be laid on a shelf, or hung up in a tree, would be utterly unbearable in warm weather, were it not that we have a retreat out of doors,—and a very pleasant retreat it is. To make my readers fully comprehend it, I must describe our whole territories.

Fancy a small plot of ground, with a pretty low irregular cottage at one end; a large granary, divided from the dwelling by a little court running along one side; and a long thatched shed open towards the garden, and supported by wooden pillars on the other. The bottom is bounded, half by an old wall, and half by an old paling, over which we see a pretty distance of woody hills. The house, granary, wall, and paling, are covered with vines, cherry-trees, roses, honeysuckles, and jessamines, with great clusters of tall hollyhocks running up between them; a large elder overhanging the little gate, and a magnificent bay-tree, such a tree as shall scarcely be matched in these parts, breaking with its beautiful conical form the horizontal lines of the buildings. This is my garden; and the long pillared shed, the sort of rustic arcade which runs along one side, parted from the flower-beds by a row of rich geraniums, is our out-of-door drawing-room.

I know nothing so pleasant as to sit there on a summer afternoon, with the western sun flickering through the great elder-tree, and lighting up our gay parterres, where flowers and flowering shrubs are set as thick as grass in a field, a wilderness of blossom, interwoven, intertwined, wreathy, garlanded, profuse beyond all profusion, where we may guess that there is such a thing as mould, but never see it. I know nothing so pleasant as to sit in the shade of that dark bower, with the eye resting on that bright piece of colour, lighted so gloriously by the evening sun, now catching a glimpse of the little birds as they fly rapidly in and out of their nests—for there are always two or three birds'-nests in the thick tapestry of cherry-trees, honeysuckles, and China-roses, which cover our walls—now tracing the gay gambols of the common butterflies as they sport around the dahlias; now watching that rarer moth, which the country people, fertile in pretty names, call the bee-bird;* that bird-like insect, which flutters in the hottest days over the sweetest flowers, inserting its long proboscis into the small tube of the jessamine, and hovering over the scarlet blossoms of the geranium, whose bright colour seems reflected on its own feathery breast; that insect which seems so thoroughly a creature of the air, never at rest; always, even when feeding, self-poised, and self-supported, and whose wings, in their ceaseless motion, have a sound so deep, so full, so lulling, so musical. Nothing so pleasant as to sit amid that mixture of the flower and the leaf, watching the bee-bird! Nothing so pretty to look at as my garden! It is quite a picture; only unluckily it resembles a picture in more quantities than one,—it is fit for nothing but to look at. One might as well think of walking in a bit of framed canvass. There are walks, to be sure—tiny paths of smooth gravel, by courtesy called such—but they are so overhung by roses and lilies, and such gay encroachers—so overrun by convolvulus, and heart's-ease, and mignonette, and other sweet stragglers, that, except to edge through them occasionally, for the purposes of planting, or weeding, or watering, there might as well be no paths at all. Nobody thinks of walking in my garden. Even May glides along with a delicate and trackless step, like a swan through the water; and we, its two-footed denizens, are fain to treat it as if it were really a saloon, and go out for a walk towards sun-set, just as if we had not been sitting in the open air all day.

What a contrast from the quiet garden the lively street! Saturday night is always a time of stir and bustle in our Village, and this is Whitsun-Eve, the pleasantest Saturday of all the year, when London journeymen and servant lads and lasses snatch a short holiday to visit their families. A short and precious holiday, the happiest and liveliest of any; for even the gambols and merry-makings of Christmas offer but a poor enjoyment, compared with the rural diversions, the Mayings, revels, and cricket-matches of Whitsuntide.

CHARACTERS.

This village of ours is swarming to-night like a hive of bees, and all the church-bells round are pouring out their merriest peals, as if to call them together. I must try to give some notion of the various figures.

First there is a group suited to Teniers, a cluster of out-of-door customers of the Rose, old benchers of the inn, who sit round a table smoking and drinking in high solemnity to the sound of Timothy's fiddle. Next, a mass of eager boys, the combatants of Monday, who are surrounding the shoemaker's shop, where an invisible hole in their ball is mended by Master Keep himself, under the joint superintendence of Ben Kirby and Tom Coper. Ben showing much verbal respect and outward deference for his umpire's judgment and experience, but managing to get the ball done his own way, after all; whilst outside the shop, the rest of the eleven, the less-trusted commons, are shouting and bawling round Joel Brent, who is twisting the waxed twine round the handles of the bats—the poor bats, which please nobody—which the taller youths are despising as too little and too light, and the smaller are abusing as too heavy and too large. Happy critics! winning their match can hardly be a greater delight—even if to win it, they be doomed! Farther down the street is the pretty black-eyed girl, Sally Wheeler, come home for a holiday from B—, escorted by a tall footman in a dashing livery, whom she is trying to curtsy off before her deaf grandmother sees him. I wonder whether she will succeed.

MRS. LUCAS AND HER DAUGHTERS.

Mrs. Lucas, still lovely and elegant, though somewhat faded and care-worn, was walking pensively up and down the grass-path of the pretty flower-court: her eldest daughter, a rosy, bright brunette, with her dark hair floating in all directions, was darting about like a bird: now tying up the pinks, now watering the geraniums; now collecting the fallen rose-leaves into the straw bonnet, which dangled from her arm; and now feeding a brood of bantams from a little barley measure, which that sagacious and active colony seemed to recognise as if by instinct, coming, long before she called them, at their swiftest pace, between a run and a fly, to await, with their usual noisy and bustling patience, the showers of grain which she flung to them across the paling. It was a beautiful picture of youth, and health, and happiness; and her clear, gay voice, and brilliant smile, accorded well with her shape and motion, as light as a butterfly, and as wild as the wind. A beautiful picture was that rosy lass of fifteen, in her unconscious loveliness, and I might have continued gazing upon her longer, had I not been attracted by an object no less charming, although in a very different way.

It was a slight elegant girl, apparently about a year younger than the pretty romp of the flower-garden, not unlike her in form and feature, but totally distinct in colouring and expression.

She sat in the old porch, wreathed with jessamine and honeysuckle, with the western sun floating round her like a glory, and displaying the singular beauty of her chestnut hair, brown, with a golden light, and the exceeding delicacy of her smooth and finely-grained complexion, so pale, and yet so healthful. Her whole face and form had a bending and statue-like grace, increased by the adjustment of her splendid hair, which was parted on her white forehead, and gathered up behind in a large knot, a natural coronet. Her eye-brows and long eye-lashes were a few shades darker than her hair, and singularly rich and beautiful. She was plaiting straw, rapidly and skilfully, and bent over her work with a mild and placid attention, a sedate pensiveness that did not belong to her age, and which contrasted strangely and sadly with the gaiety of her laughing and brilliant sister, who at this moment darted up to her with a handful of pinks and some groundsel. Jessy received them with a smile: such a smile! spoke a few words, in a sweet, sighing voice; put the flowers in her bosom, and the groundsel in the cage of a linnet that hung near her; and then resumed her seat and her work, imitating, better than I have ever heard them imitated, the various notes of the nightingale, who was singing in the opposite hedge, whilst I, ashamed of loitering longer, passed on.

The next time I saw her, my interest in this lovely creature was increased tenfold, for I then knew that Jessy was blind.

HOME AND LOVE.

Rie. Claudia — nay, start not! Thou art sad to-day:
I found thee sitting idly, 'midst thy maids —
A pretty, laughing, restless band, who plied
Quick tongue and nimble finger. Mute, and pale
As marble, those unseeing eyes were fixed
On vacant air; and that fair brow was bent
As sternly, as if the rude stranger, Thought,
Age-giving, mirth-destroying, pitiless Thought,
Had knocked at thy young giddy brain.

Cla. Nay, father,
Mock not thine own poor Claudia.

Rie. Claudia used
To bear a merry heart with that clear voice,
Prautling; and that light busy foot, astir
In her small housewifery, the blithest bee
That ever wrought in hive.

Cla. Oh! mine old home!

Rie. What ails thee, lady-bird?

Cla. Mine own dear home!

Father, I love not this new state; these halls,
Where comfort dies in vastness; these trim maids,
Whose service wearies me. Oh! mine old home!
My quiet, pleasant chamber, with the myrtle
Woven round the casement; and the cedar by,
Shading the sun; my garden overgrown
With flowers and herbs, thick-set as grass in fields;
My pretty snow-white doves; my kindest nurse;
And old Camillo. — Oh! mine own dear home!

Rie. Why, simple child, thou hast thine old fond nurse,
And good Camillo, and shalt have thy doves,
Thy myrtles, flowers, and cedars; a whole province
Laid in a garden an' thou wilt. My Claudia,
Hast thou not learnt thy power? Ask orient gems,
Diamonds, and sapphires, in rich caskets, wrought
By cunning goldsmiths; sigh for rarest birds,
Of farthest Ind, like winged flowers to flit
Around thy stately bower; and, at thy wish,
The precious toys shall wait thee. Old Camillo!
Thou shalt have nobler servants, — emperors, kings,
Electors, princes! Not a bachelor
In Christendom but would right proudly kneel
To my fair daughter.

Cla. Oh! mine own dear home!

Rie. Wilt have a list to choose from? Listen, sweet!
If the tall cedar, and the branchy myrtle,
And the white doves, were tell-tales, I would ask them
Whose was the shadow on the sunny wall?
And if, at eventide, they heard not oft
A tuneful mandoline, and then a voice,
Clear in its manly depth, whose tide of song
O'erwhelmed the quivering instrument; and then
A world of whispers, mixed with low response,
Sweet, short, and broken as divided strains
Of nightingales.

Cla. Oh, father! father! [Runs to him, and falls upon his neck.]

Rie. Well!

Dost thou love him, Claudia?

Cla. Father!

Rie. Dost thou love

Young Angelo? Yes? Saidst thou yes? That heart —
That throbbing heart of thine, keeps such a coil,
I cannot hear thy words. He is returned
To Rome; he left thee on mine errand, dear one!
And now — is there no casement myrtle-wreathed,
No cedar in our courts, to shade to-night
The lover's song?

Cla. Oh, father! father!

Rie. Now,

Back to thy maidens, with a lightened heart,
Mine own beloved child. Thou shalt be first
In Rome, as thou art fairest; never princess
Brought to the proud Colonna such a dower
As thou. Young Angelo hath chosen his mate
From out an eagle's nest.

Cla. Alas! alas!

I tremble at the height. Whene'er I think
Of the hot barons, of the fickle people,
And the inconstancy of power, I tremble
For thee, dear father.

Rie. Tremble! let them tremble.

I am their master, Claudia, whom they scorned
Endured, protected. — Sweet, go dream of love;
I am their master, Claudia.

MORGAN, SYDNEY,

Whose maiden name was Sydney Owenson, was born in Dublin, about 1783. Her father was a respectable actor at the Theatre Royal, Dublin, and gave his daughter the best advantages of education he could command. He was a man of decided talents, a favourite in the society of the city, and author of some popular Irish songs. His daughter, Sydney, inherited his predilection for national music and song. Very early in life, when she was a mere child, she published a small volume of poetical effusions; and soon after, "The Lay of the Irish Harp," and a selection of twelve Irish melodies, set to music. One of these is the well-known song of "Kate Kearney;" probably this popular lyric will outlive all the other writings of this authoress. Her next work was a novel, "St. Clair, or the Heiress of Desmond," published when she was about sixteen. It was soon followed by "The Novice of St. Dominick;" and then her most successful work, "The Wild Irish Girl," which appeared in the winter of 1801.

The book had a prodigious sale. Within the first two years, seven editions were published in Great Britain, besides two or three in America. It gained for Miss Owenson a celebrity which very few writers, of either sex, have won at so early an age. It gained her the love and blessings of the Irish people, of course; and a far more difficult achievement, it won her a high reputation in England. Some of the best and brightest characters among the proud nobility became her friends and patrons.

What were the peculiar merits of the work which won this popularity? As a novel, it certainly cannot be rated very high. The plot shows little inventive talent, and was, moreover, liable to some objection on the score of moral tendency. We allude to the plan of making the Earl of M — and his son both in love with the same lady. The denouement is very awkwardly managed, and we think most readers must have been disgusted, if not shocked, by the scene where the unconscious rivals, father and son, meet in the old chapel. There is very little development of character attempted, each person introduced being expressly designed, as is at once seen, to act a particular part, which is set down in the play.

Nor is the merit of the work in its style, which is both high-flown and puerile. The exaggerated sentiment, so often poured out by the fervid, but uncultivated writer, appears more nonsensical from the pompous phraseology in which it is so often expressed. We wonder how such great words could have been brought together to express such small meanings. This is particularly the case with the descriptive portions of the work. In short, the author, possessing naturally the wildest and warmest phase of Irish temperament, had her head filled and nearly turned by what she calls "the witching sorcery" of Rousseau; and as her taste had been very little cultivated by judicious reading, or her judgment improved by observation, it is not strange that she mistook hyperbole for elegance, and fancied that soft, mellifluous words would convey ideas of superhuman beauty. The following description of her heroine, Glorvina, is a fair specimen of this tawdry style. "Her form was so almost impalpably delicate, that as it floated on the gaze, it seemed like the incarnation of some pure ethereal spirit, which a sigh too roughly breathed, might dissolve into its kindred air; yet to this sylphide elegance of spherical beauty was united all that symmetrical contour which constitutes the luxury of human loveliness. This scarcely 'mortal mixture of earth's mould,' was vested in a robe of vestal white, which was enfolded beneath the bosom with a narrow girdle embossed with precious stones." Query, how did the lady look? Can the reader form any clear notion?

Such is the prevailing style of the book, though occasionally, when giving utterance to some strong deep feeling, which usually finds its appropriate language, the author is truly eloquent. How could a novel so written, gain such popularity? Because it had a high aim, a holy purpose. It owed its success entirely to the simple earnestness with which Miss Owenon defended her country. It is all Irish. She seemed to have no thought of self, nothing but patriotism was in her soul, and this feeling redeemed the faults of inflated style, French sentimentalism, false reasoning, and all the extravagances of her youthful fancy. Ireland was her inspiration and her theme. Its history, language, antiquities, traditions, and wrongs, these she had studied as a zealot does his creed, and with a fervour only inferior in sacredness to that of religion, she poured her whole heart and mind forth in the cause of her own native land.

After such remarkable success, it was a matter of course that Miss Owenon should continue her literary career. "Patriotic Sketches," "Ida," and "The Missionary," followed each other in quick succession. Her next work was "O'Donnell;" then "Florence MacCarthy, an Irish Tale," was published in 1818. Previously to this Miss Owenon became Lady Morgan, by marrying Sir Charles Morgan, M. D., a gentleman of considerable talents,—as his own work, "Sketches of the Philosophy of Life and Morals," shows. The marriage seemed to give new energy and a wider scope to the genius of Lady Morgan; the tastes of the husband and wife were, evidently, in sympathy. They went abroad, and "France" and "Italy," two clever specimens of Lady Morgan's powers of observation and description, were the result. These works are lively and entertaining. Lord Byron has borne testimony to the fidelity and excellence of "Italy:" if the authoress had been less solicitous of making a sensation, her book would have been more perfect, yet now it is among the best of its kind.

"The O'Briens and the O'Flahertys," a novel intended to portray national manners, appeared in 1827; "The Book of the Boudoir" in 1829. Among her other works are, "The Princess," a story founded on the Revolution in Belgium, "Dramatic Scenes from Real Life," "The Life and Times of Salvator Rosa," and "Woman and her Master," published in London, 1840. Two volumes of this work were then issued: the authoress, suffering under that painful affliction, a weakness of eyesight, was unable to complete her plan, and it has never been finished. It is a philosophical history of woman down to the fall of the Roman Empire,—a work on which Lady Morgan evidently laboured with great zeal. It should be carefully read by all who wish to gain a compendious knowledge of woman's history, and a graphic sketch of her influence in the early ages. Many new and valuable truths are promulgated; and though some of the opinions are unsound, because unscriptural, yet the earnest wish to benefit her sex, and improve society, has gifted the writer with great power in setting forth much that is true, and of the utmost importance. We hope she will have strength and energy, and a prolongation of life, to complete the work.

In estimating the merits of this indefatigable writer, we will give the opinions of British critics, only observing that, to us, the greatest blemish in her books is an under-current, more or less strong, running through many of them, bearing the philosophical opinions, or sayings rather, of the French sentimental school of infidels. We do not think Lady Morgan an unbeliever; but she gives occasion for censure by expressions, occasionally, that favour free-thinkers. If she had but served God, in her writings, with the same enthusiastic zeal she serves her country, what a glorious woman she would have been!

Mr. Chambers, in his Cyclopædia of English Literature, says:—

"Lady Morgan has, during the last thirty or forty years, written in various departments of literature—in poetry, the drama, novels, biography, ethics, politics, and books of travels. Whether she has written any one book that will become a standard portion of our literature, is doubtful, but we are indebted to her pen for a number of clever, lively national sketches and anecdotes. She has fought her way to distinction, self-educated, in the midst of raillery, sarcasm, and vituperation, provoked on the one hand by her careless and bold avowal of liberal opinions on questions of politics and the 'minor morals' of life, and on the other by her ill-concealed worship of the fashions and follies of the great, which has led her democratic friends to pronounce the pretty severe opinion, that 'there is not a pernicious vanity or affectation belonging to tuft-hunting or modishness, which she does not labour to confirm and strengthen by precept, sentiment, and her own goodly example.*' If Lady Morgan has not always taste, she has talent; if she has not always delicacy, she speaks boldly and freely; if she has got into the society of the great (the reputation of her writings, like those of Swift, 'doing the office of a blue ribbon or of a coach-and-six'), she has told us all she knows about them. She has been as liberal of satire and sarcasm as of adulation. She has a masculine disregard of common opinion or censure, and a temperament, as she herself states, 'as cheery and genial as ever went to that strange medley of pathos and humour—the Irish character.'

From "The Book of the Boudoir."

MY FIRST ROUT IN LONDON.

A few days after my arrival in London, and while my little book ("Wild Irish Girl,") was running rapidly through successive editions, I was presented to the countess dowager of C——k, and invited to a rout at her fantastic and pretty mansion in New Burlington Street. Oh, how her Irish historical name tingled on my ears, and seized on my imagination; as that of her great ancestor, "the father of chemistry, and uncle to lord Cork," did on the mind of my old friend, professor Higgins. I was freshly launched from the bogs of the barony of Tireragh, in the province of Connaught, and had dropped at once into the very sanctuary of English ton, without time to go through the necessary course of training in manners or milinery, for such an awful transition: so, with no chaperon but my incipient notoriety, and actually no toilet but the frock and the flower in which, not many days before, I had danced a jig, on an earthen floor, with an O'Rourke, prince of Brefney, in the county of Leitrim, I stepped into my job-carriage at the hour of ten, and, "all alone by myself"—as the Irish song says—

"To Eden took my solitary way."

What added to my fears, and doubts, and hopes, and embarrassments, was a note from my noble hostess, received at the moment of departure, which ran thus:—

"Every body has been invited expressly to meet the Wild Irish Girl: so she must bring her Irish harp. M. C. O."

I arrived at New Burlington Street without my Irish harp, and with a beating heart; and I heard the high-sounding titles of princes and ambassadors, and dukes and duchesses, announced, long before my own poor plebeian Hibernian name puzzled the porter, and was banded from footman to footman, as all names are banded, which are not written down in the red-book of Fashion, nor rendered familiar to the lips of her insolent menials. How I wished myself back in Tireragh with my own princes, the O's and Macs; and yet this position was among the items of my highest ambition! To be sought after by the great, not for any accidental circumstance of birth, rank, or fortune, but simply "pour les beaux yeux de mon mérite," was a principal item in the utopia of my youthful fancy. I endeavoured to recall the fact to mind; but it would not do: and as I ascended the marble stairs, with their gilt balustrade, I was agitated by emotions similar to those which drew from my countryman, Maurice Quill, his frank exclamation in the heat of the battle of Vittoria, "Oh, I wish some one of my greatest enemies was kicking me down Dame street!"

Lady C——k met me at the door of that suite of apartments which opens with a brilliant boudoir, and terminates with a sombre conservatory, where eternal twilights fall upon fountains of rose-water which never dry, and on beds of flowers which never fade,—where singing birds are always silent, and butterflies are for once at rest.

"What, no harp, Glorvina?" said her ladyship

"Oh, Lady C——!"

"Oh, Lady Fiddlestick!—you are a fool, child; you don't know your own interests. Here, James, William, Thomas, send one of the chairmen to Stanhope street, for Miss Owenson's harp.

Led on by Dr. Johnson's celebrated "little Dunce," and Boswell's "divine Maria," who kindly and protectingly drew my arm through hers, I was at once merged into that mob of élégantes and élégants, who always prefer narrow door-ways for incipient flirtations, to the clear stage and fair play of the centre of a saloon. As we stood wedged on the threshold of fashion, my dazzled eyes rested for a moment on a strikingly sullen-looking, handsome creature, whose boyish person was distinguished by an air of singularity, which seemed to vibrate between hauteur and shyness. He stood with his arms crossed, and alone, occupying a corner near the door; and though in the brilliant bustling crowd, was "not of it."

"How do, Lord Byron?" said a pretty sprite of fashion, as she glided her spirituality through a space, which might have proved too narrow for one of Leslie Forster's demi-semi souls to pass through.

Lord Byron! All "*les braves Biron*s" of French and English chivalry rushed to my mind, at the sound of the historical name! But I was then ignorant, that its young and beautiful inheritor was to give it greater claims on the admiration of posterity, than the valiant preux of France, or the loyal cavaliers of England, had yet bestowed on it. For fame travels slowly in our Barony of Tireragh; and though Lord Byron had already made his first step in that career which ended in the triumph of his brilliant and powerful genius over all his contemporaries, I had got no further in the article Byron, than the "pends-toi, br...e Biron," of Henri Quatre.

* Westminster Review, October, 1829.

After a stand and a stare of some seconds, I was pushed on—and, on reaching the centre of the conservatory, I found myself suddenly pounced upon a sort of rustic seat by Lady C——k, whose effort to detain me on this very uneasy pre-eminence, resembled Lingo's remonstrance of "keep your temper, great Rusty-fusty;" for I too was treated en princesse (the princess of Coolavin), and denied the civilized privileges of sofa or chair, which were not in character with the habits of a "Wild Irish Girl." So there I sat, "patience per force with wilful choler meeting," the lioness of the night! exhibited and shown off like "the beautiful hyena that never was tamed," of Exeter 'Change, looking almost as wild, and feeling quite as savage!

I shall never forget the cordiality with which, upon this memorable occasion, Lady C——k presented me to all that was then most illustrious for rank and talent in England; even though the manner savoured, perhaps, something too much of the Duchess de la Ferté's style of protection, on a similar occasion, "Allons, Mademoiselle, parlez—vous allez voir comme elle parle;" for if the manner was not exactly conformable to the dignity of the princess of Coolavin, the motive rendered all excusable; and I felt with the charming protégée of the French duchesse, that "so many whimsical efforts proceeded merely from a desire to bring me forward."

Presenting me to each and all of the splendid crowd, which an idle curiosity, easily excited, and as soon satisfied, had gathered round us, she prefaced every introduction with a little exordium, which seemed to amuse every one but its subject. "Lord Erskine, this is the 'Wild Irish Girl,' whom you are so anxious to know. I assure you, she talks quite as well as she writes. Now, my dear, do tell my Lord Erskine some of those Irish stories you told us the other evening at Lord C——ville's. Fancy yourself en petit comité, and take off the Irish brogue. Mrs. Abingdon says you would make a famous actress, she does indeed! You must play the short-armed orator with her; she will be here by-and-by. This is the duchess of St. A——; she has your 'Wild Irish Girl' by heart. Where is Sheridan? Do, my dear Mr. T——; (this is Mr. T——, my dear—geniuses should know each other)—do, my dear Mr. T——, find me Mr. Sheridan. Oh! here he is! what! you know each other already; tant mieux. This is Lord Carysfort. Mr. Lewis, do come forward; that is Monk Lewis, my dear, of whom you have heard so much—but you must not read his works, they are very naughty. But here is one, whose works I know you have read. What, you know him too!" It was the Hon. William Spenser, whose "Year of Sorrow," was then drawing tears from all the brightest eyes in England, while his wit and his pleasantry cheered every circle he distinguished by his presence.

Lewis, who stood staring at me through his eyeglass, backed out at this exhibition, and disappeared. "Here are two ladies," continued her ladyship, "whose wish to know you is very flattering, for they are wits themselves, l'esprit de Mortemar, true N——'s. You don't know the value of this introduction. You know Mr. Gell, so I need not present you, he calls you the Irish Corinne. Your friend Mr. Moore will be here by-and-by. I have collected 'all the talents' for you. Do see, somebody, if Mr. Kemble and Mrs. Siddons are come yet; and find me Lady Hamilton. Now pray tell us the scene at the Irish baronet's in the rebellion, that you told to the ladies of Llangollen; and then give us your blue stocking dinner at Sir Richard Phillips's; and describe us the Irish priests. Here is your countryman, Lord L——k, he will be your bottle holder."

Lord L——k volunteered his services. The circle now began to widen—wits, warriors, peers, ministers of state. The harp was brought forward, and I attempted to play; but my howl was funeral; I was ready to cry in character, but endeavoured to laugh, and to cover out my real timidity by an affected ease, which was both awkward and impolitic. The best coquetry of the young and inexperienced is a frank exhibition of its own unsophisticated feelings—but this is a secret learned too late.

GOOD MOTHERS.

That which the woman is, the mother will be; and her personal qualities will direct and govern her maternal instinct, as her taste will influence her appetite. If she be prejudiced and ignorant, the good mother will mismanage her children; and if she be violent in temper and vehement in opinion, the good mother will be petulant and unjust towards them: if she be inconsistent and capricious, she will alternate between fits of severity and bursts of indulgence, equally fatal: if she be vain, and coquettish, and selfish, she may be fond of her children through her pride, but she will always be ready to sacrifice their enjoyments, and even their interests, to the triumphs of her own vanity, or the gratification of her egotism.

The perfection of motherhood lies, therefore, in the harmonious blending of a happy instinct, with those qualities which make the good member of general society—with good sense and information with subdued or regulated passions, and that abnegation which lays every selfish consideration at the feet of duty. To make a good mother, it is not sufficient to seek the happiness of the child, but to seek it with foresight and effect. Her actions must be regulated by long-sighted views, and steadily and perseveringly directed to that health of the body and of the mind, which can alone enable the objects of her solicitude to meet the shocks and rubs of life with firmness, and to maintain that independence, in practice and principle, which sets the vicissitudes of fortune at defiance, fitting its possessor to fill the various stations, whether of wealth or poverty, of honour or obscurity, to which chance may conduct him.

This is my idea of the duties of maternity, and of the perfection of that most perfect creature — a good mother. I know it is not everybody's idea, and that there is another beau idéal of maternity which is much more prevalent.

There is the good mother, that spends half her life in hugging, flattering, and stuffing her child, till, like the little Dalia-lama of Thibet, he thinks he has come into the world for no other purpose than to be adored like a god, and crammed like a capon. This is the good mother, who, in her fondness, is seen watching anxiously, after a long late dinner, for the entrance of the little victim which she has dressed up for sacrifice, and whose vigils are prolonged beyond its natural strength, that it may partake of the poisonous luxuries in the last service of the feast of ceremony, till the fever of over-excitement mounts to its cheek, sparkles in the eye, and gives incoherency to its voluble nonsense; an excitement to be followed not by the deep and dreamless sleep of infancy, but by the restless slumbers and fearful visions of indigestion. Alas for the mother and for the child! and alas for the guests called upon for their quota of admiration upon such melancholy occasions,—such terrible exhibitions of human vanity and human weakness, counteracting the finest instincts of human nature!

WOMEN IN ASIA.

It is an awful and heart-rending act to raise the dark curtain which hangs before "the sanctuary of women" throughout the great continent of Asia, and to penetrate the domestic holds of those vain-glorious nations which arrogate to themselves the precedence in creation, and date their power and their policy from eras anterior to the written records of more civilized communities. In these states, on whose condition the passage of some thousands of years has imposed no change, and in which the sufferings of one half the species have awakened no sympathy, may be discovered the most graphic illustrations of the tyranny of man, and of the degradation of woman. There the sexes, in their mutual relations, are still where the earliest necessities of the species first placed them; perpetuating, by their false position, the barbarous rudiments of primeval society. The sin of polygamy, still unredeemed in the East, dries up the fountains of human sensibility, and crushes every better impulse of feeling,—annihilating even the hope of political liberty, and leaving the wisest legislative reformer, at best, but a happy accident, if not an anomaly and a discord.

In the Zenana of the modern Hindoo, woman is still reared the slave of the most frightful superstition,—the victim of the most selfish institutes which man has yet devised. Frail, her infidelity to her lord is punished by a living burial; faithful, her constancy is rewarded by a place on his funeral pyre; her life and death, alike a violence to nature, an outrage to society, and a mortifying evidence of the incapacity of some races for improvement and reform.

WOMEN IN CHINA.

But there is a pompous and a pedantic land, which boasts supremacy in wisdom and in science from an epoch anterior to all human record, save its own—China, the land of many letters, of many lanterns, and of few ideas. Peopled by the long-eared, elliptic-eyed, flat-nosed, olive-coloured, Mongolian race, it offers a population singularly deficient in intellectual physiognomy; though, to its absurd ugliness, the women of the higher classes occasionally offer striking exceptions.

In China, polygamy prevails virtually, if not by name; and the sovereign, self-imprisoned in his golden-roofed palace, with his one empress, six queens, and three hundred (or, if he please, three thousand) concubines, reflects, on the great scale, the domestic establishment of those among his subjects whose wealth may permit the irrational indulgence of their passion or their pride. The female slave, who, at the head of a band of inferior slaves, is dignified with the name of superior, (adequate to that of wife,) who has been purchased with gold, may be returned, if on trial not approved, is not deemed worthy to eat at her master's table. Crippled from her cradle, morally and physically, ignorant of any one of the many thousand letters of her husband's alphabet, referred to the futile amusements of infancy for all resource against utter tedium, to dress and to smoke are her highest pleasures; and to totter on the flat roof of her golden cage, her sole privilege. She, too, feeble and imbecile as she is, is outraged in the only feeling that nature may have rescued from the wreck of man's oppression; for the Chinese wife, like the odalisque of Turkey, yields up her offspring a sacrifice to the murderous policy of her master.

If such is the destiny of the lady of the celestial empire, the woman of the middle and lower classes submits to a yet severer fate. She it is who feeds and rears the silk-worm, with an attention to details of which the female organization is so pre-eminently capable; she reels the produce, and works and weaves the silk. It is the woman, too, who cultivates the most tender tea-plants, and whose delicate fingers are alone fitted to roll the finer tea-leaf. Having thus furnished her quota to the common means of national wealth, she also works that exquisite gold and silver filagree, and prepares those gorgeous adornments, in which imperial vanity delights to adorn the ponderous and puerile divine-righted ruler of the celestial empire.

Descending yet lower in the social chain, the female peasant of China presents a still more extraordinary example of plodding industry. Exposed to the inclemency of the seasons, with the infant tied to her back, which she may have rescued from the wild beast, or from the devouring wave, she ploughs, sows, reaps, and performs the thousand offices of toil and drudgery attached to the cultivation of the soil, from which she derives so little benefit and enjoyment. Denied, too, all moral rights, she incurs, nevertheless, a fatal responsibility for her husband's delinquencies; and suffers death with him, as his dependent, for crimes in which she could have no moral participation. The natural death of her husband gives her over to the family, who, to recover the money expended in her purchase, may re-sell her to the highest bidder, while her own is very frequently the work of her own hand. Suicide, it is asserted, is of frequent occurrence among the Chinese females of the lowest classes; and well may they seek death, to whom, from the cradle to the tomb, life holds forth not one solitary good.

MOTT, LUCRETIA,

WIDELY known for her philanthropy, and distinguished as a preacher among her own sect of "Friends," or "Quakers," is a native of the island of Nantucket, Mass. Her parents were Thomas and Anna Coffin; the latter, born Folger, was related to Dr. Franklin. Lucretia was in childhood instructed to make herself useful to her mother, who, in the absence of her husband, had the charge of his mercantile affairs. In 1804, when Lucretia was about eleven years old, her parents removed to Boston, where she had the advantage of attending one of the public schools. At the age of thirteen, she was sent to a "Friends' boarding-school," in the State of New York, where she remained three years, during the last year being employed as an assistant teacher; which shows how great her proficiency and faithfulness must have been. Her parents had, meantime, removed to Philadelphia; there she joined them, and at the age of eighteen was married to James Mott, who also belonged to the "Society of Friends," and subsequently entered into mercantile partnership with her father. Thus early was Mrs. Mott settled in life; and it is but justice to her to state, that she has been attentive to discharge well the womanly duties devolved on her—has been the mother of six children, five of whom are living, and do credit to their mother's forming care. She has also, in the chances and changes of an American merchant's life, been called to help her husband in the support of their family; and she did it, as a good wife does, willingly, with her whole heart. But these duties did not engross all her time; her active mind, directed and developed by the peculiar teachings of her sect, took a wider range than has yet been usual with her sex. We do not agree with her in religious sentiment; nor can we commend her manner of teaching as an example to be followed by American women. But we do believe she is conscientiously sincere and earnest in her endeavours to do good; and therefore we will give extracts from a letter of hers, embodying the views of faith and duty which have governed her life:

"I always loved the good, often in childhood desired to do the right, and prayed for strength to overcome or regulate a naturally quick or hasty temper. The religion of my education—that the obedience of faith to manifested duty ensured salvation—commended itself to my understanding and conscience. The doctrine of human depravity was not taught as an essential of the Christian's creed. The free agency of man was inculcated; and any departure from the right was ascribed to wilful disobedience of the teachings of the light within us.

"The numerous evils in the world were traced to this source. My sympathy was early enlisted for the poor slave, by the reading-books in our schools, depicting his wrongs and sufferings, and the pictures and representations by Thomas Clarkson, exhibiting the slave-ship, the middle passage, &c. The ministry of Elias Hicks and others on this subject, as well as their example in refusing the products of the unrequited bondman's labour, awakened a strong feeling in my heart.

"The unequal condition of woman with man also early impressed my mind. Learning, while at school, that the charge for the education of girls was the same as that for boys, and that, when they became teachers, women received only half as much as men for their services, the injustice of this distinction was so apparent, that I resolved to claim for my sex all that an impartial Creator had bestowed, which, by custom and a perverted application of the Scriptures, had been wrested from woman.

"At twenty-five years of age, surrounded with a little family and many cares, I still felt called to a more public life of devotion to duty, and engaged in the ministry in our Society. I received every encouragement from those in authority, until the event of a separation among us in 1827, when my convictions led me to adhere to the sufficiency of the light within, resting on "truth as authority," rather than "taking authority for truth." I searched the Scriptures daily, and often found the text would bear a wholly different construction from that which was pressed upon our acceptance.

"Being a non-conformist to the ordinances and rituals of the professed Church, duty led me to hold up the insufficiency of all these, including Sabbath-day observance, as the proper test of the Christian character, and that only 'he that doeth righteousness is righteous.'

"The practical life, then, being the highest evidence of a sound faith, I have felt a far greater interest in the moral movements of our age, than in any theological discussion.

"I hailed the Temperance Reform in its beginning in Massachusetts, watched its progress with much interest, was delighted with the fidelity of its advocates, and for more than twenty years I have practised total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks.

"The cause of Peace has had a share of my efforts, taking the ultra non-resistance ground—that a Christian cannot consistently uphold, and actively support, a government based on the sword, or whose ultimate resort is to the destroying weapon.

"The oppression of the working classes by existing monopolies, and the lowness of wages, especially of women, has often engaged my attention; and I have held and attended meetings with this class of society, and heard their appeals with heartfelt compassion, and with heartfelt desire for a radical change—that systems by which the rich are made richer, and the poor poorer, should find no favour among people professing to 'fear God and hate covetousness.' Hence, the various associations and communities tending to greater equality of condition—'a home for all,' &c.—have had from me a hearty God speed."

In 1840, the "World's Anti-Slavery Convention" was held in London. Several of the American delegates were women, among whom was Lucretia Mott. No doubt she was the most able of all who were sent, and much was expected from her eloquence; but the English abolitionists had not reformed their old views of the sexes; they would not admit American women, any more than their own, on the platform. This brought what is termed "the woman question"—that is, the inherent right of the female to an equal participation with the male sex in all social, political, and religious offices—more into view.

Mrs. Mott advocates the doctrine of perfect equality of rights, if not of duties. These views form the distinctive character in her discourses, though it is but just to her to add that her language is mild, and her manners gentle and unassuming. As a preacher among her own order—the Hicksite or Unitarian Quakers—she is more widely celebrated than any other, of either sex, in the United States. She has a natural gift of speech; her sermons sound better than they read, because her persuasive manner prevents the listener from noticing the fallacies of her reasoning, so easily detected in her printed productions. These consist of "Speeches" and "Sermons," published in newspapers, chiefly; one "Sermon to Medical Students" is printed in pamphlet form, and so also is her "Discourse on Woman," delivered in Philadelphia, December 17th, 1849.

We admire her talents, but must express our profound regret that an American woman should lend her influence to infidelity! How strange Mrs. Mott, with her intelligence and sagacity, does not perceive that the religion of the Bible is the only source of strength for woman, and that, where its requirements are most fully observed by men, there our sex rises highest in esteem and honour.

The observance of one day in seven as a sacred duty is the exponent of revealed religion, because it testifies the faith of men in the Bible, and also their submission to its divine authority. By this authority, and no other, moral virtue is placed in the ascendant. Woman rises only by moral power. Abolish the Sabbath, and one of the main pillars of her security and influence would be stricken down. Look over the world where the Sabbath is not hallowed, and mark the state of the female sex—everywhere defiled, despised, degraded! Does "the light within"—does human reason teach the equality of the sexes, or make the stronger yield the way to the weaker? Look again—over those nations professing Christianity, yet devoting half of the Lord's Day to the service of the world. Are not the condition and powers of the women considered exceedingly inferior to those of men, wherever physical force rules the people? Neither civil nor religious freedom exist but in the two nations which most strictly observe the Lord's Day; and the Protestant people of Great Britain and America may safely trust the comparison between their condition and that of the anti-Sabbath-keeping world to show the wisdom of their course.

It is the sacred province of woman to guard the light of Christianity, and uphold the divine authority of the Bible; by these only her position is elevated, and her soul finds its true sphere—that of doing good. These cardinal truths, it seems, Mrs. Mott has not yet discovered. In her "Discourse on Woman," she says—

"Let woman then go on—not asking as favour, but claiming as right, the removal of all the hindrances to her elevation in the scale of being—let her receive encouragement for the proper cultivation of all her powers, so that she may enter profitably into the active business of life; employing her own hands in ministering to her necessities, strengthening her physical being by proper exercise and observance of the laws of health. Let her not be ambitious to display a fair hand, and to promenade the fashionable streets of our city; but rather, coveting earnestly the best gifts, let her strive to occupy such walks in society as will befit her true dignity in all the relations of life. No fear that she will then transcend the proper limits of female delicacy. True modesty will be as fully preserved in acting out those important vocations to which she may be called, as in the nursery or at the fireside, ministering to man's self-indulgence.

"Then, in the marriage union, the independence of the husband and wife will be equal, their dependence mutual, and their obligations reciprocal."

It is evident that Mrs. Mott places the "true dignity of woman" in her ability to do "man's work," and to become more and more like him. What a degrading idea; as though the worth of porcelain should be estimated by its resemblance to iron! Does she not perceive that, in estimating physical and mental ability above moral excellence, she sacrifices her own sex, who can never excel in those industrial pursuits which belong to life in this world? Woman has the hope of a "better inheritance, even a heavenly," in her keeping; to raise humanity towards the angelic is her office. The most "important vocation" on earth is that of the mother in her nursery. The true wife has a ministry more holy at home than the pulpit ever displayed; for she, "by her chaste conversation, coupled with fear"—(that is, piety, with gentleness and humility)—may convert and save her husband when the preacher fails.

In short, the theories of Mrs. Mott would disorganize society; but nature is more potent than her reasoning. The gentle sex are endowed with the faith and hope which things of this life cannot satisfy. Woman's "best gifts" are employed to promote goodness and happiness among those whose minds take their tone from her private character. Measured by this standard, Mrs. Mott deserves an estimation higher than her public displays of talent or philanthropy have ever won.

MOWATT, ANNA CORA,

Was born in France. Her father, Mr. Ogden, was a wealthy and highly respected citizen of New York. On her mother's side, she is descended from Francis Lewis, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. Mr. Ogden having involved his fortune in the well-known Miranda expedition, embarked in mercantile business, which obliged him to remove to Bordeaux, where he resided several years. He was the father of seventeen children, of whom Mrs. Mowatt was the tenth. These young people possessed histrionic talent in a remarkable degree, which developed itself during this residence in France. The fine old chateau in which they resided, a short distance from the town, possessed, as many of those old French houses do, a little theatre, and it was here that they early began to exercise their talents.

When Anna was about six years old, Mr. Ogden returned to his native land. The children, however, continued to pursue their theatrical amusements, and the little Anna became remarkable for her skill in reading aloud. At thirteen, she was an insatiable reader. Among other works, she studied a great number of French plays, altering several of Voltaire's for private theatricals, in which she took a part. When scarcely more than fourteen, she attracted the attention of Mr. Mowatt, a wealthy lawyer of New York, a visitor in her father's family, who soon after proposed for her. The proposal was accepted by all parties, her father stipulating that the marriage should be deferred till Anna had attained her seventeenth year.

Meanwhile, the youthful fiancée continued her studies, attending school as formerly. Domestic clouds, however, soon began to darken, as is proverbially the case, around this "course of true love." There was some danger of the match being broken off, and to prevent any further difficulty, an elopement was decided upon. This was effected during the bustle and confusion attending the preparations for a play, which the young people were to act, in honour of their father's birth-day. The youthful bride was soon pardoned and received by her affectionate parents; her husband's residence, a fine estate about four miles from New York, allowing her still, from its near neighbourhood, to form a part of the family circle. Here, surrounded by wealth and every indulgence, Mrs. Mowatt continued her studies with untiring ardour, devoting herself principally to the study of French, Spanish and music, and never turned aside from these important occupations by the calls made upon her by society, which her social accomplishments rendered her so well fitted to adorn. During the first two years of her married life she published her first works, two volumes of poems, which, however, do not possess more merit than belongs to the ordinary run of juvenile productions. She occasionally exercised her skill in writing and arranging little dramatic pieces for private performance, which amusements lent their aid in embellishing this brilliant period of her life.

Mrs. Mowatt's health now began to decline—great fears were entertained of consumption—and a voyage to Europe was decided upon. Mr. Mowatt's professional engagements preventing his leaving New York, she accompanied some members of her family abroad. She remained in Bremen three months, when, being joined by her husband, they repaired to Paris. Here, where they had every opportunity of mingling in the most influential society of that gay and intelligent capital, she found time for study. She devoted herself to the acquirement of the Italian language, and wrote a play, in five acts, called "Gulzare, or the Persian Slave," which was afterwards published, though originally written for a private circle. After an absence of a year and a half, they returned to the United States; soon after which, clouds began to darken over their once prosperous career. In consequence of Mr. Mowatt's residence abroad, and partly from an affection of the eyes, he gave up his profession of the law, and embarked to a considerable extent in commercial speculations. Unfortunately, very soon after, one of those commercial crises occurred that convulse the whole mercantile world, and ruin, which it was impossible to avert, was impending over them. The weakness of his eyes prevented Mr. Mowatt from returning to his profession, and they were without resource.

Some time before these domestic events occurred, dramatic readings had met with great success in various cities of the Union. Mrs. Mowatt had heard these readings, and when their misfortunes fell upon them, the idea of turning her own talents to account in the same manner occurred to her. She had many difficulties to contend with in taking such a step. The injustice of society, which degrades woman in the social scale, if by her own honourable exertions she endeavours to labour for money, would operate against her, and of course influence her friends to oppose a project which must bring her before the public almost in the character of a dramatic performer. The consent of her husband being obtained however, she quietly made all the arrangements for her first attempt, which was to take place in Boston, delaying to inform her father of the step she contemplated, till her departure for that city. She had, however, the happiness to receive his full approval before her first appearance. Her success in Boston far exceeded her expectations; and in Providence and New York, where she continued her readings, it was confirmed. Mrs. Mowatt suffered much from the disapprobation expressed by her friends at her having undertaken this public career, which was deemed by them a degradation—a forfeiture of caste. Her health gave way, and for two years she was a confirmed invalid.

About this time, Mr. Mowatt became principal partner in a publishing concern, and the whole force of Mrs. Mowatt's mind was turned to aid him. Under the name of Helen Berkley, she wrote a series of articles which became very popular, and were translated into German and republished in London. The success of these productions induced Mrs. Mowatt to write in her own name; and "she was accused by a wise critic of copying the witty Helen Berkley!" Her desultory writings were numerous and various. Unfortunately, the publishing business in which Mr. Mowatt was engaged proved unsuccessful, and new trials came upon them.

Being told that nothing would be so productive as dramatic writings, Mrs. Mowatt, in 1845, wrote her first comedy, called "Fashion," which was brought out with much splendour at the Park Theatre, New York. Its success was brilliant; and in Philadelphia it was performed with equal éclat. In less than two months after, she accepted the offer of an engagement from the manager of the Park Theatre, and made her début in New York in the Lady of Lyons. Her success was complete, and her vocation was decided upon.

After a series of profitable engagements in the principal cities of the Union, Mr. and Mrs. Mowatt embarked for England; and in December, 1847, she made her first appearance before a foreign audience in Manchester. Her success was such, that a London engagement at the Princess's Theatre followed, where she performed for several weeks. A brilliant engagement in Dublin was soon after completed; since which time, her professional career continued to be successful in England, till interrupted by the loss of her husband, who died in London, in February, 1851. Mrs. Mowatt is slight and graceful in form, with a lovely countenance possessing all the principal requisites of beauty. In character she is "brave-hearted in adversity; benevolent, unselfish, and devoted."

NEAL, ALICE BEADLEY,

Was born in Hudson, New York, and was educated chiefly at a seminary for young ladies, in New Hampshire. In 1846, she was married to Mr. Joseph C. Neal, of Philadelphia, at that time editor of Neal's Saturday Gazette, a man highly esteemed for his intellectual abilities, and warmly beloved for his personal qualities. Being left a widow a few months after her marriage, Mrs. Neal, although very young, was entrusted with the editorship of her husband's paper, which she has since conducted, in connection with Mr. Peterson, with remarkable ability, The Saturday Gazette continuing one of the most popular weekly papers of the city. She is principally known, as yet, as a contributor of tales and poems to the different periodicals of the day. In 1850, some of her writings were collected in one volume, under the title of "The Gossips of Rivertown; with Sketches in Prose and Verse." Mrs. Neal seems to have been endowed by nature with peculiar abilities for the sphere in which she has, by Providence, been placed. She began to write when quite a child; and in all her works she shows great facility in the use of her pen, a keen appreciation of the beautiful, and an almost intuitive penetration into the half-concealed springs that actuate the intercourse of society. Yet it is as a poetess, rather than a prose writer, that she will be chiefly admired, if we may judge of the ripened fruit by the fair blossoms of the early spring. The easy and harmonious flow of her verses, and the tenderness and feeling expressed in them, will make them always read and admired. In that most important literary department, writing books which children love to read and gain wisdom from reading, Mrs. Neal excels; her two charming little books, "Helen Morton's Trial" and "Pictures from the Bible," are deservedly popular.

From "Poems."

THE BRIDE'S CONFESSION.

A sudden thrill passed through my heart.
Wild and intense—yet not of pain—
I strove to quell quick, bounding throbs,
And scanned the sentence o'er again.
It might have been most idly penned
By one whose thoughts from love were free,
And yet, as if entranced, I read,
"Thou art most beautiful to me."

Thou did'st not whisper I was dear —
 There were no gleams of tenderness,
 Save those my trembling heart would hope
 That careless sentence might express.
 But while the blinding tears fell fast,
 Until the words I scarce could see,
 There shone, as through a wreathing mist,
 "Thou art most beautiful to me."

To thee! I cared not for all eyes,
 So I was beautiful in thine;
 A timid star, my faint, sad beams
 Upon thy path alone would shine.
 Oh, what was praise, save from thy lips —
 And love should all unheeded be,
 So I could hear thy blessed voice
 Say—"Thou art beautiful to me."

And I have heard those very words —
 Blushing beneath thine earnest gaze —
 Though thou, perchance, had'st quite forgot
 They had been said in by-gone days.
 While clasped hand, and circling arm,
 Drew me still nearer unto thee,
 Thy low voice breathed upon mine ear,
 "Thou, love, art beautiful to me."

And, dearest, though thine eyes alone
 May see in me a single grace,
 I care not, so thou e'er can'st find
 A hidden sweetness in my face.
 And if, as years and cares steal on,
 Even that lingering light must flee,
 What matter! if from thee I hear,
 "Thou art still beautiful to me!"

OLD LETTERS.

Through her tears she gazed upon them,
 Records of that brief, bright dream!
 And she clasped them closer — closer —
 For a message they would seem
 Coming from the lips now silent —
 Coming from a hand now cold,
 And she felt the same emotion
 They had thrilled her with of old:

Blended with a holy grieving —
 Blended with a throbbing pain —
 For she knew the hand had penned them
 Might not clasp her own again.
 And she felt the desolation
 That had fallen on her heart;
 Bitter memories thronged around her,
 Bitter murmurs would upstart.

She had waited for their coming,
 She had kissed them o'er and o'er —
 And they were so fondly treasured
 For the words of love they bore,
 Words that whispered in the silence,
 She had listened till his tone
 Seemed to linger in the echo,
 "Darling, thou art all mine own!"

Faster still the tears came falling
 Through her white and wasted hands,
 Where the marriage ring — the widow's —
 Linked their slender golden bands.
 Sobs half stifled still were struggling
 Through her pale and parted lips;
 Oh, her beauty with life's brightness
 Suffered a most drear eclipse!

Slowly folding, how she lingered
 O'er the words his hands had traced!
 Though the plashing drops had fallen,
 And the faint lines half effaced.
 "Gone for ever — oh, for ever!"
 Murmur'd she, with wailing cry —
 Ah, too true, for through the silence
 Came no voice to give reply.

It is passed. The sob is stifled —
 Quivering lips are wreathed with smiles,
 Mocking with their strange deceiving,
 Watchful love she thus beguiles —
 With the thought that o'er her spirit
 Sorrow's shadow scarce is thrown;
 For those letters have a message
 To her heart, and hers alone.

THE DAY OF REST.

"When will the Sabbath be gone, that we may set forth wheat"
Amos viii. 5.

What! give one day, from dawn to eve,
 To worship and to prayer!
 Lay down all plans of worldly gain,
 All worldly hope and care?
 Thy creed is strait as Pharisee —
 Our years too quickly fly —
 For, saith the wise man, "eat and drink,
 To-morrow ye may die."

So Pleasure turns with mocking smile,
 And Thrift goes hurrying on,
 While cold Formality, though mute,
 Wishes the hours were gone.
 The earth a softer smile may wear,
 The very brutes rejoice,
 And only from the heart of man
 Ascends no grateful voice.

Why was this day so sanctified?
 That from thy faltering tongue
 A heartless prayer might struggle forth,
 Reluctant praise be wrung?
 Oh mite! oh worm of dust and death!
 Thine adulation dies,
 A note scarce heard where ever rings
 The psalm of the skies.

Think of the choral strains that swell!
 That glad triumphal song,
 "Glory, and might, and majesty
 'To thee our God belong."
 The stars are trembling in the flood
 Of melody that thrills
 Onward and upward, till all space
 The glorious anthem fills!

Nay, not for this the seal was set
 That marks the day of rest —
 For thine, and not thy Maker's good,
 Its hallowed hours were blest.
 He knows thy murmurs, ere it comes
 To win thee from thy care,
 And marks how grudgingly are paid
 Thy tithes of praise and prayer.

Oh restless, grasping, sordid heart!
 Rather give praise to Heaven
 That all thy schemes to toil and reap
 This day from thee are riven.
 Thy pulse shall beat more free and calm
 For Sabbath rest and peace,
 That woos thee gently towards the home
 Where Sabbaths never cease.

From Dedication of "The Gossips of Rivertown," &c.

TO THE MOTHER OF JOSEPH C. NEAL.

As Ruth, of old, wrought in her kinsman's field —
 From the uneven stubble patiently
 Gathering the corn full hands had lavish'd free,
 Nor paused from sun, or air, her brow to shield —
 So have I gleaned, where others boldly reap:
 Their sickles flashing through the ripen'd grain,
 Their voices swelling in a harvest strain,
 Go on before me up the toilsome steep.
 And thus I bind my sheaf at even-tide
 For thee, my more than mother! and I come
 Bearing my burden to the quiet home
 Where thou did'st welcome me, a timid bride;
 Where now thy blessed presence, day by day,
 Cheereth me onward in a lonely way.

NICHOLS, MARY SARGEANT GOVE-

WIFE of T. L. Nichols, M. D., formerly an Allopathic physician in the city of New York, where he is now an eminent "Water Cure" practitioner, with whom she is in profession associated. Before her marriage with Dr. Nichols, which took place in 1848, she conducted with great success a Water Cure establishment in that city, and was widely known as Mrs. Gove—her name by a former marriage—the physician for her own sex.

Few, among living women, deserve more respect than Mrs. Gove-Nichols; she has, in her own example, illustrated the beneficial results of knowledge to her sex, the possibility of success under the greatest difficulties, and above all, the importance that women, as well as men, should have an aim in life,—the high and holy aim of doing good.

Mrs. Gove-Nichols, whose maiden name was Neal, was born in 1810; her native place was Goffstown, State of New Hampshire, where her early years were passed. The advantages of education for girls were at that time very limited, and Mary Neal was not in a favoured position to secure even these. But she had an ardent desire to acquire knowledge, and become useful; and Providence, as she believes, aided her fervent wish. When a young girl, chance threw in her way a copy of Bell's Anatomy; she studied it in secret, and received that bias towards medical science which decided her destiny. Every medical book she could obtain she read, and when these were taken from her, she turned her attention to French and Latin,—good preliminary studies for her profession, though she did not then know it.

When about eighteen years of age, she commenced writing for newspapers; these poems, stories, and essays, are only of importance as showing the activity of her genius, which then, undeveloped and without an aim, was incessantly striving upward. Soon after her marriage with Mr. Gove, a work fell in her way* which gave the true impulse to her ardent temperament. We will give the account in Mrs. Gove's own words, premising that, at about the same time she read the works of Dr. John Mason Good, and her attention was particularly arrested by his remarks on the use of water; and from his writings, and the Book of Health, which she read during the year 1832, she became convinced of the efficacy of cold water in curing diseases.

"My warrant for this practice," she says, "was obtained wholly from these books. It was not till years afterwards, that I heard of Preissnitz and Water Cure, as I now practise it. From this time I was possessed with a passion for anatomical, physiological, and pathological study. I could never explain the reason of this intense feeling to myself or others; all I know is, that it took possession of me, and mastered me wholly; it supported me through efforts that would otherwise have been to me inconceivable and insupportable. I am naturally timid and bashful; few would be likely to believe this who only see my doings without being acquainted with me. But timid as I was, I sought assistance from scientific and professional men. I went through museums of morbid specimens that, but for my passion for knowledge, would have filled me with horror. I looked on dissections till I could see a woman or child dissected with far more firmness than I could now look upon the killing of an animal for food. My industry and earnestness were commensurate, notwithstanding my health was far from being firm. I had innumerable difficulties to contend against. When I am dead, these may be told for the encouragement of others—not till then. When I retired to rest at night, I took my books with me: the last minute I could keep awake was devoted to study, and the first light that was sufficient, was improved in learning the mysteries of our wonderful mechanism. My intense desire to learn seemed to make every one willing to help me who had knowledge to impart. Kindness from the medical profession, and the manifestation of a helpful disposition towards my undertakings, were every where the rule.

"After my marriage I resided for several years in New Hampshire, and then moved to Lynn, Mass., near Boston. Here I engaged in teaching, and had many more facilities for pursuing my studies than ever before.

"In 1837, I commenced lecturing in my school on anatomy and physiology. I had before this given one or two lectures before a Female Lyceum, formed by my pupils and some of their friends. At first I gave these health lectures, as they were termed, to the young ladies of my school, and their particular friends whom they were allowed to invite, once in two weeks; subsequently, once a week. In the autumn of 1838, I was invited by a society of ladies in Boston to give a course of lectures before them on anatomy and physiology. I gave this course of lectures to a large class of ladies, and repeated it afterward to a much larger number. I lectured pretty constantly for several years after this beginning in Boston. I lectured in Massachusetts, Maine, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland and Ohio, and also on the island of Nantucket. Physicians were uniformly obliging and friendly to me. I do not now recollect but one exception, and this was a 'doctor,' who I believe honestly thought that knowledge was, or would be injurious to women, and therefore he opposed me in my efforts to teach. I have forgotten his name, and I presume the world will do the same. But I have not forgotten, and never can forget, the many who have held out the hand of help to me, and through me to others, 'or I have never learned selfishly; what I have gained for myself I have gained for others.

"The passion that has possessed me from my first reading on pathology, I consider providential. I believe fully, that I have been set apart from my birth for a peculiar work. I may be called enthusiastic and superstitious for this conviction, but it is mine as much as my life. My ill health, from earliest infancy, the poverty and struggles through which I have passed, and the indomitable desire which I have had to obtain knowledge, all seem to me so many providences. During the time that I studied alone, my enthusiasm never for one moment failed. Day and night, in sickness and in health, the unquenchable desire for knowledge and use burned with undiminished flame. I studied day and night, though all the time I had to labour for bread,—first with my needle, and later with a school.

"It may be said that I was an enthusiast, and that my enthusiasm sustained me. I grant this; but will those who make this assertion define the word enthusiasm? To me it means, as it meant through those many long years, an unflinching trust in God, and an all-pervading desire to be useful to my fellow-beings. If these constitute religious enthusiasm, then I am an enthusiast."

We can add little of interest to this graphic sketch of Mrs. Gove-Nichols, except to give a selection or two from her latest works, which will show her persevering efforts in the profession she has chosen, rather than her literary merits. Of her remarkable talents, there can be no doubt, nor of her sincerity. Whether she is or is not right, time must determine.

Besides these engrossing medical pursuits, Mrs. Gove found time to continue her literary studies. In 1844, she commenced writing for the Democratic Review; she wrote the "Medical Elective Papers," in the American Review, and was a contributor to Godey's Lady's Book. She prepared her "Lectures to Ladies on Anatomy and Physiology," which work was published by the Harpers in 1844. They also published, about the same time, Mrs. Gove's little novel, "Uncle John, or is it too much trouble," under the nomme de plume of Mary Orne, which she assumed when writing fictitious tales. In this way she sent forth "Agnes Norris, or the Heroine of Domestic Life," and "The Two Loves, or Eros and Anteros;" both written in the hurry of overburdened life, and, as might be expected, evincing that the spirit was prompting to every means of active exertion, while the natural strength was not sufficient for all these pursuits.

MEDICAL PRACTICE.

It is not my object to attack any school of medicine. I wish to give a very brief history of the principles and practice of the scientific schools of medicine, and also to give some results of my own labours in water-cure.

I know that it is considered, by some, presumption for a woman to come before the public as a physician. It is very unpleasant to some to see long-established customs broken, and long-cherished prejudices set at nought, even when a great good is to be achieved. But this is by no means the only class of persons in the community.

"Upward and onward," is the governing thought and the impelling motive of thousands. To these I speak—to these I bring the results of my investigations and my labours. The thought and the deed commend themselves to such as these with no hindrance from respectable custom or grey-headed prejudice.

In looking over the history of medical science, we find that Allopathy has great claims on our respect. The Allopathic school has always insisted on its professors being educated.

Whatever has been known of anatomy, physiology, and pathology, in the past, has been taught by the Allopathic school; and there is no difference between the professors of Allopathy and Homœopathy in this respect. Both insist on thorough education. Both schools have been laborious in noting the characteristic symptoms of disease, and the effects of what they considered remedies. Perhaps the Homœopathic school has been most earnest and assiduous in this last work; but Homœopathy being of recent date, must rest its claims to our gratitude more on the zeal and minuteness of its observations and discoveries, than on the length of its days, or the voluminousness of its records. The members of the Allopathic profession have differed with regard to the primary cause of disease. Those of the Homœopathic profession, I believe, have been united.

Amongst the Allopathists, one portion have advocated what was termed the Humoral Pathology, and another, the Nervous Pathology. Of all the nervous pathologists, Dr. Billings is clearest. He says, "all diseases have exhausted nervous influence for their cause." He says further,—

"During health, the capillary arteries go on with the work of nutrition and secretion, the muscles are fed, the mucous surfaces are lubricated just enough to prevent any sensation from the substances that pass along them—the serous surfaces are made sufficiently soft to slide upon each other without sensation, and the skin is kept soft by an insensible vapour. All this time, there is another process going on, which is the removal of superfluous matter by the absorbents."

After demonstrating that all these processes are carried on by the nervous energy, Dr. Billings shows by irrefragable argument, that the loss of this energy must produce disease.

Bœrhaave seems, in the latter part of his life, to have had a glimpse of this doctrine; indeed, he admitted the agency of the nervous power. In proof of this, we may mention that in the 755th of his aphorisms, where he lays down the proximate cause of intermitting fevers, he makes a change in the fourth edition. Hitherto it had stood—"Whence, after an accurate examination of the whole history, the proximate cause of intermittents is established to be viscosity of the arterial fluid." To this in the fourth edition is added, "Perhaps, also, the inertia of the nervous fluid as well of the cerebrum as of the cerebellum destined for the heart."

This theory of disease is shadowed in Cullen. According to Cullen, the system is superintended and regulated by a mobile and conservative energy seated in the brain, acting wisely but necessarily for the good of the whole. This energy, he considers to be distinct from the soul, and acting not only for the preservation, but the recovery of health.

Faint traces of this theory of disease may be found in the Brunonian system.

Darwin carries the idea farther, under the name of sensorial fluid. Broussais comes next to Brown with his theory of "organic contractility."

Humoral Pathology asserts, that morbid changes in the blood are the cause of disease.

Homœopathy asserts that psora is the cause of disease.

A little reflection shows that all these statements are true, and that it would be an error for either school to assert that the evil it sees is only the cause of disease.

It is clear, that if all the functions of the system are carried on, and the whole maintained in a state of health by the nervous energy, then if this nervous energy is wasted by any abuse, either by too much labour, too much thought, the domination of passion, or by taking poisonous stimulants, the nervous power, being thus wasted, cannot maintain the system in health. The consequence is disease, and the deposition of morbid matter in the system, which would have been thrown out if the nervous power had been left to do its work.

Thus we see that the observations of nervous and humoral pathologists and homœopathists have all been valuable and truthful.

The practice of both these schools is understood. It is to give as remedies the most virulent poisons known to us.

The extreme minuteness of the doses used by homœopaths, has been a great recommendation to those who have seen the bad effects of allopathic doses, and yet have not lost their faith in medicine.

I have used homœopathic medicine with care and in entire good faith, upon myself and my patients. The result of my trials with it has been to convince me, that though it has been, and is, a great negative good to the world, it has no positive efficacy. But the hygienic rules insisted on by Homœopathists are worthy of all praise.

With regard to allopathy, I must say that I studied it honestly, and because it poisons and oppresses the human constitution with drugs, and debilitates it with bleeding, I consider it one of the greatest evils that now rests upon the civilized world. But I do not attach the blame of this evil to individual practitioners of the art. Monarchy and despotism are bad—gigantic in their badness, but kings and despots may be good men.

These evils have their origin with the people and our only hope of removing them is in promoting the intelligence of the people.

I maintain that the cause of disease is one—the want of nervous energy. Numerous occasions spring from this cause. In the fact, that diseasing matter is left in the system, not only for years but for generations, is seen the foundation of the assertion of the homœopathic school, that psora is the cause of all disease.

The great questions for humanity are, What is the cause of disease? and what remedial treatment is best?

As a water cure physician, I maintain that nervous energy is restored, and morbid matter cast out of the system, by means of the proper application of water cure.

We see that in case of disease, morbid matter must be expelled from the system, and by means of the nervous energy. It becomes important, then, to know whether we shall add to the evil already in the system, and to the labour of the already enfeebled vital energy, the most virulent poisons known to us, and which are called medicines, and thus still farther waste the vital energy by compelling it to strive to expel the poison of the disease and the poison of the medicine at once.

I contend that we can add to the vital power continually, by the water cure.

With regard to the evils of blood-letting, I have only to say in the language of Scripture, "the blood is the life." The regular medical profession is rapidly purifying itself from the heresy of blood-letting, or taking the life of patients.

Majendie, Marshall, Hall, Eberle, and many others, are doing this work, and there is no doubt that the good sense of the community is aiding in it more than physicians or people are aware.

It is impossible to do any justice to the subject of blood-letting in a paragraph, and I shall not therefore attempt it. In my "Lectures to Ladies on Anatomy and Physiology," page 226, some interesting facts and authorities are given. The regular profession of medicine has been, and is, the depository of much knowledge. My hope is, that it will not lag behind the age.

It is known that the faculty bleed less, and give less medicine, and use more water, than formerly. I see no good reason why this reform should not go on progressively with the intelligence and consequent demand of the public.

The greatest men in the profession have sanctioned the use of water. Hippocrates, the father of medicine, used water in his treatment of disease. His works bear testimony to the cure of cramp, convulsions, gout, and tetanus, by water.

Galen, who lived in the second century, cured fever with water only.

Celsus recommends water for the cure of certain diseases.

Boerhaave recommends water to make the body firm and strong.

Hoffman, a contemporary of Boerhaave, wrote on water for the cure of disease. He said if there was a universal medicine, it was water. Hahn also wrote on water cure; and one of the best water cure works was written by Currie, a Fellow of the Royal Society, Liverpool, and published in 1799.

In 1749, Rev. John Wesley published a work on water cure. He gives a list of eighty diseases curable by water.

Dr. Billings and others have had a correct theory of disease. Their error has been in introducing medicines into the system, which they thought increased the nervous or contractile power. The medicines being poison, and recognised as such by the vital organism, have aroused all the energy left in the body to cast them out. The poison has not increased the power, but stimulated what remained, to action, and has thus resulted in still greater waste to the system. Increase of action has been mistaken for increase of power, and the stimulation of poison for the tonic or strengthening effects of medicine.

The frightful effects of various kinds of medicines can hardly be exaggerated. One of the most common is calomel.

Salivation and the destruction of the organs of speech, and of the nose; incurable rheumatisms and paralysis, with rottenness of the bones, have been caused by calomel, and minor ills produced by it are every where. But with regard to the effects of medicines, a volume would not do them justice.

Of homœopathic medicines, I must say, that if I believed in their potency at all, I should believe it an evil potency, because they are the poisons of allopathy. Chalk, charcoal, and cuttle-fish, and several other substances used by the homœopaths, are exceptions. These, surely, cannot do injury. I should not fear to drink the water of Lake Superior, if a few grains of arsenic had been mixed with the whole of it. On the same principle I have never feared homœopathic medicines.

The darkness of this civilized era, with respect to the effects of medicines upon the human system, and the blind faith of even educated people in physicians, is to me one of the most astonishing phenomena in the world. But there is encouragement. Light—more light, is the anxious cry of many.

Some years since, I passed through the Albany Medical College. I saw there human bones that had rotted down under the poison of mercury. I saw tumours, ranged in glass vases, weighing from one to more than twenty pounds. Doctors had doubtless done all they could to cure these diseases. With what they had done, or in spite of it, the victims of ignorance and abuse had died. Knowledge would have saved them from sufferings which cannot be described, and from premature death. When I saw these things, and many more that I cannot speak of, in that College, a devotion to woman—to the work of spreading light on the subject of health and disease, was kindled in my heart, that death only can quench.

I felt then that I would lay myself on the altar, and be burned with fire, if woman could be saved from the darkness of ignorance, and the untold horrors of her diseases.

GENERAL VIEW OF MY PRACTICE AND SUCCESS.

In 1843, I obtained books from England on the Water Cure, and much practical information from Henry Gardner Wright, an English gentleman, who spent some time in this country during that year. He brought several works on Water Cure, and being in bad health, he applied the water in his own case successfully at my father's house, where he remained some months. The books that he brought, the accounts that he gave me of Priessnitz' practice, and Water Cure practitioners in England, and his application of water in his own case, added to my practical knowledge and conviction on the subject, removed the last remnant of my faith in drugs, and induced me to practise water cure alone in every case that came under my care. I soon saw what qualifications were requisite to make a successful practitioner of water cure. There are no rules of practice applicable to all cases, but the water cure physician must have judgment to adapt the treatment to the vital or reactive power possessed by the patient. A practice that would be eminently successful in one case, would surely destroy life in another. Care and ability in the diagnosis of disease, and skill in adapting the treatment to the strength and peculiar idiosyncrasy of the patient, are indispensable to success in water cure.

In 1844, at the opening of Dr. Wesselhoeft's water cure house in Brattleborough, Vermont, I went to that place. I boarded near the water cure house for three months, and observed the practice very carefully. I also gave lectures to classes, composed of ladies who were under water treatment, and others. From Brattleborough I went to Lebanon Springs water cure house. They had no resident physician, and I concluded to remain for a time in that capacity. I took charge of the patients there for three months with the best success, and then came to New York, in the latter part of the autumn of 1844. I went to Dr. Shew's water cure house in Bond street, and remained for some weeks and saw his practice. I then took rooms, and gave lectures to classes of young ladies, and advice to patients, and attended to out-door practice till May, 1845, when I went to reside at my late water cure house, 261 Tenth street. There I have given lectures to classes of ladies, and have taken board and day-patients, and have also attended to out-door practice, as at my present residence.

The first two years I had a large number of board-patients, who came from a distance, from Connecticut, Northern New York, Rhode Island, Ohio, Kentucky, and several from the Southern States. During the past year, my practice has changed its character. Water cure houses have been established in different parts of the country, and patients can be treated nearer home; consequently, I have not had so many board-patients. I have now a much larger practice in the city, which is doubtless owing to the spread of intelligence respecting water cure amongst the people, and also to the fact of my having become known.

I have looked over the records of my practice in this city, noting all failures and deaths, and their causes. Only two patients have died under my care—both children; one died in the summer of '47, the other in the summer of '49. The first died of disease of the brain and dysentery, the last of dysentery. Both were about nine months of age; both were born of unhealthy mothers, and were scrofulous. They seemed not to be organized to live any longer.

It may seem strange that, with a large practice, I have had so few deaths. I do not attribute this to my skill altogether, though I believe that I understand my profession; but it has so happened.

I am now looking toward the education of women as physicians, and particularly to attend to midwifery practice. If our medical colleges are not soon opened to woman, others will be founded where she will be educated. The spirit of the age will not any longer submit to bonds.

NOË, CANEDI MADDALENA,

Is a native of Bologna. Early in life she had the opportunity at Bologna of acquiring a knowledge of literature and science, for which she manifested decided abilities. She was admitted to that celebrated university, and then, after going through the regular studies, attended a course of law lectures. In this science she became so thoroughly versed, that the faculty determined to bestow a degree upon her. This was done on the 26th of April, 1807. The college of lawyers, in endowing her with the doctoral ring, presented her with a black velvet gown, embroidered in gold with laurel leaves, and in the centre, woven in gold letters, these words,—“Collegium Doctorum Juris Archigymnasii Bonon, dat merenti.”

Shortly after this she married, and has since lived in the most retired domestic privacy. Nor has the remembrance of her laurels or literary triumphs diminished in the least the mildness and modesty which are an essential part of her character.

NORTON, CAROLINE ELIZABETH SARAH,

GRAND-DAUGHTER of Richard Brinsley Sheridan, has well sustained the family honours. Her father was Thomas Sheridan, and her mother was the daughter of Colonel and Lady Elizabeth Callander. Mr. Sheridan died while his children were quite young, and their mother devoted herself entirely to their education. Mr. S. C. Hall, in his Gems of the Modern Poets, describes the early genius of Miss Caroline Sheridan, and the care her mother bestowed; his notice is doubtless correct.

“To her accomplished and excellent mother,” he says, “may be attributed much of Mrs. Norton’s literary fame;—it forms another link in that long chain of hereditary genius which has now been extended through a whole century. Her sister, the lady of the Hon. Captain Price Blackwood, is also a writer of considerable taste and power: her publications have been anonymous, and she is disinclined to seek that notoriety which the ‘pursuits of literature’ obtain; but those who are acquainted with the productions of her pen will readily acknowledge their surpassing merit.

The sisters used, in their childish days, to write together; and, before either of them had attained the age of twelve years, they produced two little books of prints and verses, called ‘The Dandies’ Ball’ and ‘The Travelled Dandies,’ both being imitations of a species of caricature then in vogue. But we believe that, at a much earlier period, Mrs. Norton had written poetry, which even now she would not be ashamed to see in print. Her disposition to ‘scribble,’ was, however, checked rather than encouraged by her mother; for a long time, pen, ink, and paper were denied to the young poetess, and works of fiction carefully kept out of her way, with a view of compelling a resort to occupations of a more useful character. Her active and energetic mind, notwithstanding, soon accomplished its cherished purpose. At the age of seventeen, she wrote ‘The Sorrows of Rosalie,’ and, although it was not published until some time afterwards, she had scarcely passed her girlhood before she had established for herself the distinction which had long been attached to her maiden name.”

When about nineteen years of age, Miss Sheridan married the Hon. George Chapel Norton, brother of the present Lord Grantley. He had proposed to her three years before, but her mother had postponed the engagement on account of her daughter’s youth; and in the mean time Miss Sheridan had made an acquaintance with one whose early death prevented a union more consonant to her feelings. When Mr. Norton again sought her hand, he received it; but the marriage was an unhappy one, and they were separated in 1849. The world has heard the slanders to which she has been exposed, and a verdict of entire acquittal from all who listened to them, can scarcely have atoned for the cruel and baseless suspicions and persecution to which she was subjected. Her reputation as a virtuous woman is now established beyond suspicion. England may well be proud of this gifted daughter of song; and her own sex throughout the world should honour her for the noble courage of soul by which she overcame the malignity of unmerited persecution.

Mrs. Norton's second work was "The Undying One," a poem, founded on the legend of the Wandering Jew. In 1840, she published "The Dream, and other Poems." In noticing these two works, a writer in the Quarterly Review says of Mrs. Norton—"This lady is the Byron of our modern poetesses. She has very much of that intense personal passion by which Byron's poetry is distinguished from the larger grasp and deeper communion with man and nature of Wordsworth. She has also Byron's beautiful intervals of tenderness, his strong practical thought, and his forceful expression. It is not an artificial imitation, but a natural parallel." Another British writer,* commenting on the subject, more justly observes—"That Mrs. Norton has a fervour, a tenderness, and a force of expression, which greatly resemble Byron's, there can be no doubt; but there all similarity ceases. Byron is the personification of passionate selfishness; his range of sympathy is extremely small. Mrs. Norton, on the other hand, has a large and generous heart, essentially unselfish in its feelings, and universal in its sympathies. (How perfectly these two persons typify the differences in the characteristics of the sexes!) Byron has a sneering, mocking, disbelieving spirit; Mrs. Norton a simple, beautiful, child-like implicitness of soul. Byron's strains resemble the vast, roaring, wilful waterfall, rushing headlong over desolate rocks, with a sound like the wail of a lost spirit; Mrs. Norton's, the soft, full-flowing river, margined with flowers, and uttering sweet music."

With these opinions of Mr. Rowton we entirely concur; and there are some remarks by an American writer, Rev. Dr. Bethune, which are highly creditable to his own cultivated taste and moral feelings, as well as truly just to this distinguished lady. "The traces of Mrs. Norton's sufferings are burned deeply on her pages. She scorns to hide the workings of her embittered memory and outraged heart; yet her tone, though unconstrained, is lofty, yielding not to man, but to the force of nature. What she has endured, has taught her not misanthropy, but a stronger sympathy with the weak and the wronged, a nobler eloquence in appeals for freedom, truth, and general justice."

In 1843, appeared her noble poem, "The Child of the Islands;" the nominal hero was the then baby prince of Wales, but the real purpose of Mrs. Norton was to portray the condition of the poor in England. The philanthropy which prompted the poem is as warm and holy as her genius is pure and fervid. The production was received with favour, and has, no doubt, been of essential service in awakening the public mind to the cause of suffering humanity. Mrs. Norton's last work is a beautiful combination of her varied talents, entitled "Music on the Wave;" the words and music both her own—published in 1851.

The Honourable Mrs. Norton, as her true style is, divides now with Mrs. Barrett Browning the laurel Great Britain confers on her daughters of song. Mr. Horne, in his New Spirit of the Age, says of these two distinguished women:—"Both possess not only great mental energies, but that description of strength which springs from a fine nature, and manifests itself in productions which evidently originated in genuine impulses of feeling. The subjects they both choose appear spontaneous, and not resulting from study or imitation, though cast into careful moulds of art. Both are excellent artists: the one in dealing with subjects of domestic interest; the other in designs from sacred subjects, poems of religious tendency, or of the supernatural world. Mrs. Norton is beautifully clear and intelligible in her narrative and course of thought and feeling; Miss Barrett has great inventiveness, but not an equal power in construction. The one is all womanhood; the other all wings."

This true womanly sentiment is a distinguishing characteristic of Mrs. Norton's productions. Her poems are replete with beauties of language, of images, and of thought; the most impassioned passages are characterized by a sweet feminine delicacy and purity of tone. Among her short poems, many exquisite ones might be quoted. She has also succeeded in the almost impossible achievement—really good English sonnets. As a prose writer, she must be ranked among the best contributors to the annuals; and her novel, "Woman's Reward," is hardly surpassed by any of its contemporary romances. On the whole, we are inclined to place Mrs. Norton at the head of the living Women of Genius, who now make England distinguished as the favoured country in Europe for the development of the virtues, the talents, and the true graces of womanhood. Mrs. Norton has, we believe, powers of mind to sustain, worthily, her high position.

From "The Dream."

Lines to the Duchess of Sutherland.

Once more, my harp! once more, although I thought
Never to wake thy silent strings again,
A wandering dream thy gentle chords have wrought,
And my sad heart, which long hath dwelt in pain,
Soars, like a wild bird from a cypress bough,
Into the poet's heaven, and leaves dull grief below!

And unto thee—the beautiful and pure—
Whose lot is cast amid that busy world
Where only sluggish Dulness dwells secure,
And Fancy's generous wing is faintly furled;
To thee—whose friendship kept its equal truth
Through the most dreary hour of my embittered youth—

I dedicate the lay. Ah! never bard,
In days when poverty was twin with song;
Nor wandering harper, lonely and ill-starred,
Cheered by some castle's chief, and harboured long;
Not Scott's Last Minstrel, in his trembling lays,
Woke with a warmer heart the earnest meed of praise

* Frederic Rowton.

For easy are the aims the rich man spares
To sons of Genius, by misfortune bent;
But thou gav'st me, what woman seldom dares,
Belief—in spite of many a cold stream—
When, slandered and maligned, I stood apart
From those whose bounded power hath wrung, not crushed, my heart.

Thou, then, when cowards lied away my name,
And scoffed to see me feebly stem the tide;
When some were kind on whom I had no claim,
And some forsook on whom my love relied,
And some, who might have battled for my sake,
Stood off in doubt, to see what turn the world would take—

Thou gav'st me that the poor do give the poor,
Kind words and holy wishes, and true tears;
The loved, the near of kin, could do no more,
Who changed not with the gloom of varying years,
But clung the closer when I stood forlorn,
And blunted Slander's dart with their indignant scorn

For they who credit crime, are they who feel
Their own hearts weak to unresisted sin;
Memory, not judgment, prompts the thoughts which steal
O'er minds like these, an easy faith to win;
And tales of broken truth are still believed
Most readily by those who have themselves deceived.

But like a white swan down a troubled stream,
Whose ruffling pinion hath the power to fling
Aside the turbid drops which darkly gleam
And mar the freshness of her snowy wing—
So thou, with queenly grace and gentle pride,
Along the world's dark waves in purity dost glide—

Thy pale and pearly cheek was never made
To crimson with a faint false-hearted shame;
Thou didst not shrink—of bitter tongues afraid,
Who hunt in packs the object of their blame;
To thee the sad denial still held true,
For from thine own good thoughts thy heart its mercy drew

And though my faint and tributary rhymes
Add nothing to the glory of thy day,
Yet every poet hopes that after-times
Shall set some value on his votive lay;
And I would fain one gentle deed record,
Among the many such with which thy life is stored

So when these lines, made in a mournful hour,
Are idly opened to the stranger's eye,
A dream of thee, aroused by Fancy's power,
Shall be the first to wander floating by,
And they who never saw thy lovely face,
Shall pause, to conjure up a vision of its grace!

TWILIGHT.

Oh! Twilight! Spirit that dost render birth
To dim enchantments; melting heaven with earth,
Leaving on craggy hills and running streams
A softness like the atmosphere of dreams;
Thy hour to all is welcome! Faint and sweet
Thy light falls round the peasant's homeward feet,
Who, slow returning from his task of toil,
Sees the low sunset gild the cultured soil,
And, tho' such radiance round him brightly glows,
Marks the small spark his cottage-window throws.
Still as his heart forestalls his weary pace,
Fondly he dreams of each familiar face,
Recalls the treasures of his narrow life,
His rosy children and his sunburnt wife,
To whom his coming is the chief event
Of simple days in cheerful labour spent.
The rich man's chariot hath gone whirling past,
And these poor cottagers have only cast
One careless glance on all that show of pride,
Then to their tasks turn'd quietly aside;
But him they wait for, him they welcome home,
Fixed sentinels look forth to see him come;
The fagot sent for when the fire grew dim,
The frugal meal prepared, are all for him;
For him the watching of that sturdy boy,
For him those smiles of tenderness and joy,

For him—who plods his sauntering way along,
Whistling the fragment of some village song!
Dear art thou to the lover, thou sweet light,
Fair fleeting sister of the mournful night!
As in impatient hope he stands apart,
Companion'd only by his beating heart,
And with an eager fancy oft beholds
The vision of a white robe's fluttering folds.

OBSCURITY OF WOMAN'S WORTH.

In many a village churchyard's simple grave,
Where all unmarked the cypress branches wave,
In many a vault where Death could only claim
The brief inscription of a woman's name;
Of different ranks, and different degrees,
From daily labour to a life of ease,
(From the rich wife, who through the weary day
Wept in her jewels, grief's unceasing prey,
To the poor soul who trudged o'er marsh and moor,
And with her baby begged from door to door,—)
Lie hearts, which, ere they found that last release,
Had lost all memory of the blessing "Peace;"
Hearts, whose long struggle through unpitied years
None saw but Him who marks the mourner's tears.
The obscurely noble! who evaded not
The woe which He had willed should be their lot,
But nerved themselves to bear!

Of such art thou,
My mother! With thy calm and holy brow,
And high devoted heart, which suffered still Unmurmuring, through each degree of ill.
And, because Fate hath willed that mine should be
A Poet's soul (at least in my degree,)—
And that my verse would faintly shadow forth
What I have seen of pure unselfish worth,—
Therefore I speak of Thee; that those who read
That trust in woman, which is still my creed,
The early-widowed image may recall
And greet thy nature as the type of all!

WEEP NOT FOR HIM THAT DIETH.

"Weep ye not for the dead, neither bemoan him; but weep sore for him that goeth away, for he shall return no more, nor see his native country."—Jeremiah xxii. 10.

Weep not for him that dieth—
For he sleeps, and is at rest;
And the couch whereon he lieth
Is the green earth's quiet breast;
But weep for him who pineth
On a far land's hateful shore,
Who wearily declineth
Where ye see his face no more!

Weep not for him that dieth,
For friends are round his bed,
And many a young lip sigheth
When they name the early dead;
But weep for him that liveth
Where none will know or care,
When the groan his faint heart giveth
Is the last sigh of despair.

Weep not for him that dieth,
For his struggling soul is free,
And the world from which it flieth
Is a world of misery;
But weep for him that weareth
The captive's galling chain:
To the agony he beareth,
Death were but little pain.

Weep not for him that dieth,
For he hath ceased from tears,
And a voice to his replieth
Which he hath not heard for years,
But weep for him who weepeth
On that cold land's cruel shore—
Blest, blest is he that sleepeth,—
Weep for the dead no more!

SONNET.

Like an entranced bird, who wildly springs,
 With a keen sparkle in his glancing eye
 And a strong effort in his quivering wings,
 Up to the blue vault of the happy sky,—
 So my enamoured heart, so long thine own,
 At length from Love's imprisonment set free,
 Goes forth into the open world alone,
 Glad and exulting in its liberty:
 But like that helpless bird, (confined so long,
 His weary wings have lost all power to soar,)—
 Who soon forgets to trill his joyous song,
 And, feebly fluttering, sinks to earth once more,—
 So, from its former bonds released in vain,
 My heart still feels the weight of that remembered chain

SONNET. — TO MY BOOKS.

Silent companions of the lonely hour,
 Friends, who can never alter or forsake,
 Who for inconstant roving have no power,
 And all neglect, perforce, must calmly take—
 Let me return to you; this turmoil ending
 Which worldly cares have in my spirit wrought,
 And, o'er your old familiar pages bending,
 Refresh my mind with many a tranquil thought,
 I'll, haply meeting there, from time to time,
 Fancies, the audible echo of my own,
 'T will be like hearing in a foreign clime
 My native language spoke in friendly tone,
 And with a sort of welcome I shall dwell
 On these, my unripe musings, told so well.

MAN AND WOMAN.

Warriors and statesmen have their meed of praise,
 And what they do, or suffer, men record;
 But the long sacrifice of woman's days
 Passes without a thought, without a word:
 And many a lofty struggle for the sake
 Of duties sternly, faithfully fulfilled—
 For which the anxious mind must watch and wake,
 And the strong feelings of the heart be still'd—
 Goes by unheeded as the summer wind,
 And leaves no memory, and no trace behind!
 Yet it may be, more lofty courage dwells
 In one meek heart which braves an adverse fate,
 Than his whose ardent soul indignant swells,
 Warm'd by the fight, or cheer'd through high debate
 The soldier dies surrounded: could he live alone to suffer, and alone to strive?

LONDON OUTCASTS.

What see the old trees then? Gaunt, pallid forms
 Come, creeping sadly to their hollow hearts,
 Seeking frail shelter from the winds and storms,
 In broken rest, disturb'd by fitful starts;
 There, when the chill rain falls, or lightning darts,
 Or balmy summer nights are stealing on,
 Houseless they slumber, close to wealthy marts
 And gilded homes: there, where the morning sun
 That tide of wasteful joy and splendour look'd upon.
 There the man hides whose better days are dropp'd
 Round his starvation, like a veil of shame;
 Who, till the fluttering pulse of life hath stopp'd,
 Suffers in silence, and conceals his name:
 There the lost victim, on whose tarnish'd fame
 A double taint of Death and Sin must rest,
 Dreams of her village home and parents' blame,
 And in her sleep, by pain and cold oppress'd,
 Draws close her tatter'd shawl athwart her shivering breast
 Her history is written in her face:
 The bloom hath left her cheek, but not from age
 Youth, without innocence, or love, or grace,
 Blotted with tears, still lingers on that page;
 Smooth brow, soft hair, dark eyelash, seem to wage
 With furrow'd lines a contradiction strong;
 Till the wild witchcraft stories, which engage
 Our childish thoughts, of magic change and wrong,
 Seem realized in her—so old, and yet so young!

And many a wretch forlorn, and huddled group
 Of strangers met in brotherhood of woe,
 Heads that beneath their burden weakly stoop,
 Youth's tangled curls, and Age's locks of snow,
 Rest on those wooden pillows, till the glow
 Of morning o'er the brightening earth shall pass;
 And these depart, none asking where they go;
 Lost in the World's confused and gathering mass,
 While a new slide fills up Life's magic-lantern glass.

COMMON BLESSINGS.

Those "common blessings!" In this chequered scene
 How little thanksgiving ascends to God!
 Is it, in truth, a privilege so mean
 To wander with free footsteps o'er the sod,
 See various blossoms paint the valley clod,
 And all things into teeming beauty burst?—
 A miracle as great as Aaron's rod,
 But that our senses, into dullness nurse,
 Recurring Custom still with Apathy hath curst.
 They who have rarest joy, know Joy's true measure;
 They who most suffer, value Suffering's pause;
 They who but seldom taste the simplest pleasure,
 Kneel oftener to the Giver and the Cause.
 Heavy the curtains feasting Luxury draws,
 To hide the sunset and the silver night;
 While humbler hearts, when care no longer gnaws,
 And some rare holiday permits delight, [sigh.
 Linger, with love would watch that earth-enchanting

THE BLIND.

The wild bird's carol in the pleasant woods
 Is all he knows of Spring! The rich perfume
 Of flowers, with all their various scented buds,
 Tells him to welcome Summer's heavy bloom.
 And by the wearied gleaners trooping home,—
 The heavy tread of many gathering feet,—
 And by the laden wagon-loads that come
 Brushing the narrow hedge with burden sweet,—
 He guesses harvest in, and Autumn's store complete.
 But in God's Temple the great lamp is out;
 And he must worship glory in the dark!
 Till Death, in midnight mystery, hath brought
 The veiled Soul's re-illuminating spark.—
 The pillar of the Cloud enfolds the ark!
 And, like a man that prayeth underground
 In Bethlehem's rocky shrine, he can but mark
 The lingering hours by circumstance and sound.
 And break with gentle hymns the solemn silence round.
 Yet still Life's Better Light shines out above!
 And in that village church where first he learned
 To hear his cheerless doom for Heaven's dear love,
 He sits, with wistful face for ever turned
 To hear of those who heavenly pity earned:
 Blind Bartimeus, and him desolate
 Who for Bethesda's waters vainly yearned.
 And inly sighs, condemned so long to wait,
 Baffled and helpless still, beyond the Temple gate.

THE WIDOW.

The old trite story—ever new,
 To those who find its fate their own,
 Had been that woman's lot; she loved,
 Was wooed—was left—and now was lone
 And in the burst of her despair,
 She would have yielded up her breath,
 But that a rosy cherub stood
 Ever between her soul and death,
 Saying, "Forsake me not, dear life,
 That art the better part of mine;
 Have pity on the feeble grasp,
 Which baby fingers round thee twine;
 Have pity on the dumb bright eyes
 Whose sole expression is of love,
 Still answering with a ready smile
 The mother's smile that bends above;
 Have pity on the tender limbs
 Now cradled on thy rocking knee—
 If even friends thy prayers have spared.
 Oh! what will strangers prove to me!"

PARDOE, JULIA,

HAS travelled much, and written many books. Her works have all been reprinted in the United States; yet she has never been a favourite in our reading republic. There seems to us something wanting in her writings; her works of fact want historic truth in details, those of fiction want impassioned truth in sentiment. But the British Reviews commend her talents highly; and we borrow from one* of these the following well-written sketch.

"Miss Pardoe is the second daughter of Major Thomas Pardoe, of the Royal Wagon Train, an able and meritorious officer, who, after having partaken of the hardships and shared the glories of the Peninsular campaigns, concluded a brilliant military career on the field of Waterloo, and has not since been engaged in active service.

"Miss Pardoe gave promise, at a very early age, of those talents which have since so greatly distinguished her. Her first work, a poetical production, was dedicated to her uncle, Captain William Pardoe, of the Royal Navy, but is not much known, and though exhibiting considerable merit, will hardly bear comparison with her more mature and finished productions. The earliest of her publications which attained much notice, was her 'Traits and Traditions of Portugal,' a book which was extensively read and admired. Written in early youth, and amid all the brilliant scenes which she describes, there is a freshness and charm about it, which cannot fail to interest and delight the reader.

"The good reception which this work met with, determined the fair author to court again the public favour, and she published several novels in succession—'Lord Morcar,' 'Hereward,' 'Speculation,' and 'The Mardyns and Daventrys.' In these it is easy to trace a gradual progress, both in power and style, and the last-named especially is a work worthy of a better fate than the generality of novels. But we are now approaching an era in the life of Miss Pardoe. In the year 1836, she accompanied her father to Constantinople, and, struck by the gorgeous scenery and interesting manners of the East, she embodied her impressions in one of the most popular works which have for many years issued from the press. 'The City of the Sultan' at once raised her to the height of popularity. The vividness of the descriptions, their evident truthfulness, the ample opportunities she enjoyed of seeing the interior of Turkish life, all conspired to render her work universally known and as universally admired. This was speedily followed by 'The Beauties of the Bosphorus,' a work, like 'The City of the Sultan,' profusely and splendidly illustrated, and this again by 'The Romance of the Harem.'

"Miss Pardoe's power of description and habits of observation appeared to point out to her her line of literature as peculiarly that of recording the wonders of foreign lands, and a tour which the family made through the Austrian empire, enabled her to give the world the results of her observations on Hungary in that excellent work, 'The City of the Magyar,' a work now more than ever deserving of public notice—less gay and glittering than 'The City of the Sultan,' her work on Hungary exhibits deeper research; its statistics are peculiarly accurate; and it is on all hands admitted to be one of the best books of travel ever submitted to the public.

"A very short time after the publication of this work, appeared 'The Hungarian Castle,' a collection of Hungarian legends, in three volumes, interesting on all grounds, but especially as filling up a very little known page in the legendary history of Europe.

"About this time, Miss Pardoe, finding her health suffering from the too great intensity of study and labour to which she had subjected herself, retired from the great metropolis, and has since resided with her parents in a pleasant part of the county of Kent. The first emanation from her retirement, was a novel, entitled 'The Confessions of a Pretty Woman,' a production which was eagerly read, and rapidly passed into a second edition. In due course of time this was followed by another, 'The Rival Beauties.' These tales are more able than pleasing; they are powerful pictures of the corruptions prevalent in modern society, and bear too evident marks of being sketches from the life. We have placed 'The Rival Beauties' out of its proper order, that we may conclude by a notice of those admirable historical works on which Miss Pardoe's fame will chiefly rest—her 'Louis the Fourteenth' and 'Francis the First.' The extremely interesting character of their times admirably suited Miss Pardoe's powers as a writer, and she has in both cases executed her task with great spirit and equal accuracy. The amount of information displayed in these volumes is really stupendous, and the depth of research necessary to produce it, fully entitles Miss Pardoe to take a very high rank among the writers of history.

"Her style is easy, flowing, and spirited, and her delineations of character as vivid as they are just; nor would it be easy to find any historical work in which the utile is so mingled with the dulce, as in those of Miss Pardoe.

"She is now, we hear with much pleasure, engaged on 'A Life of Mary de Medici,' a subject extremely suited to her pen."

We cannot refrain from expressing our hope that this anticipated work will, in some respects, excel her "Louis the Fourteenth," which has been much talked of, and, perhaps, much read. La Bruyère says, "There is a taste for every thing; even the worst has its partisans." This stricture of a sagacious observer may account for the popularity of Miss Pardoe's "Louis the Fourteenth;" yet, with such materials, it seems to us wonderful a book could have been written by a woman with so little moral interest to commend it. Trivial gossip, unfair views, and, above all, the reproduction of many scandalous anecdotes, that tend to nothing but catering to a taste for grassière, mar this work; nor are such faults redeemed by any peculiar charm of style or arrangement. We like Miss Pardoe's novels better than her histories.

AMUSEMENTS OF THE COURT OF FRANCIS.

In the month of May, Francis, probably somewhat alarmed by the deficit which had already betrayed itself in the national exchequer, removed his court to Amboise, whither Madame d'Angoulême had preceded him, for the purpose of celebrating at that castle the marriage of Mademoiselle de Bourbon, the sister of the connétable, with the Duke de Lorraine; and it is upon record that, on this occasion, being desirous to give some variety to the festivities, which were limited in their nature by the fact that, in a private residence, the etiquette of mourning for the late king did not permit either balls or masquerades, the young monarch caused a wild boar, which had been taken alive in the neighbouring forest, to be turned loose in the great court-yard of the castle, having previously ordered every issue, by which the savage denizen of the woods might escape, to be carefully closed. This being, as it appeared, fully accomplished, the courtly company then assembled at Amboise, stationed themselves at the windows, whence they amused themselves by casting darts and other missiles at the enraged and bewildered animal.

Highly excited by this novel pastime, bets ran high between the young nobles on their respective skill; and bright eyes watched anxiously the flight of every weapon as it was hurled from the respective casements. Suddenly, however, shrieks of terror echoed through the spacious apartments. The boar, tortured beyond endurance, had made a furious plunge at the door which opened upon a great staircase; had dashed it in, and was rapidly ascending the steps which led to the state-rooms, and which were protected only by a hanging drape of velvet; when the king, rushing from the apartment where the horror-stricken ladies were crowding about the queen, and, thrusting aside the courtiers who endeavoured to impede his passage, threw himself full in the path of the maddened animal, and, adroitly avoiding his first shock, stabbed him to the heart.

TRAINING A BEAUTY.

My mother's personal arrangements once made, she turned her attention to myself, and masters of every description were forthwith provided for me. The exertions of Mademoiselle had already commenced. It was decided that, short as had been the period of her dictatorship, I was undeniably improved—in appearance. I made a more graceful courtesy, had got rid of my shyness, and did not, by any unlandladylike demonstrations of energy, disturb the propriety of my dress.

Nothing could be better! Compliments were showered upon Mademoiselle, and praises upon myself; after which we each made a lower and more elegant courtesy than before, and withdrew to our ultima Thule.

Under the care of this invaluable preceptress, I learnt to apply the apothegm which has since been (falsely) attributed to her distinguished countryman, Prince Talleyrand, that "words were given to us to disguise our thoughts." By the way, how frequently it occurs that the world fastens upon an acknowledged wit, a shrewd saying to which he has never given utterance! It would appear that individuals who occasionally stumble upon a good thing, of which they themselves do not perhaps appreciate the full merit, anxious that it should not be lost, terminate it with, "as so and so said;" and in this manner, in order to save their saying, sacrifice themselves. Even so, I should imagine, was the really profound and diplomatic "saw," which I have just quoted, fastened upon the modern Machiavel, who, nevertheless, disclaimed its parentage.

I learnt, also, to agree—at least in words—with every one upon every subject, and never to betray my own sentiments and opinions; to look upon every thing through the medium of expediency; and to appreciate rank and riches beyond all other human attributes.

THE RELIGION OF FASHION.

Religion I had none. Mademoiselle tried the village church, and the preaching of good Dr. James, on one solitary occasion, and then pleaded her conscience as an excuse for absenting herself thenceforward. I had occasionally accompanied my mother and her party; but as the family pew was closely curtained round with heavy damask, and I sat on a cushion beside the fire, amusing myself with the richly-illustrated prayer-books, and catching fragments of their conversation, which, out of respect for the place, was carried on in soft whispers, and thereby only rendered the more attractive, I seldom heard more than the responses, and the extremely inharmonious singing of the children of Lady Madelaine's schools, which, even at that early age, used to set my teeth on edge.

My notions of religion were consequently of a very vague and unformed description. When, as I sometimes saw my mother and her guests preparing to attend the morning service with undisguised and even acknowledged reluctance, I ventured to inquire for what reason she submitted to an annoyance which it was in her power to avoid, she answered me very sententiously that she went to church "for the sake of example"—that "it was necessary that the lower orders should see persons of station uphold the clergy, or they might presume to absent themselves in their turn, which was a thing not to be thought of." She did not explain for what reason, nor did I enquire, for she was evidently weary of the subject; while I, on my side, felt no particular interest in its continuance. I was accordingly quite satisfied, from that time forth, whenever I swelled the train of my mother on this septenary duty, that I was setting an example to the "lower orders," and was consequently a person of considerable importance both to Dr. James and his parish.

USES OF ADVERSITY.

Oh! adversity is a shrewd task-mistress: a mighty moral leveller—how it teaches us to appreciate kindness, and to discover friends where we had previously only discerned inferiors! It is, indeed, as the great poet of the world has said, the jewel struck out of the ugliness and venom of the heart. Fine friends fall away—the dust of the butterfly's wings is swept off by the cold touch of this same adversity—and it is then, and only then, that we turn to simple, pure, and honest human hearts for comfort. Happy they, who even thus tardily find what they seek.

PASTA, JUDITH,

Was born in 1798, at Como, near Milan, of a Jewish family. At the age of fifteen, she was admitted as a pupil to the Conservatorio di Milan, then under the direction of Asiolé. Her voice was naturally hard and unequal, and she had great difficulty in satisfying the master of vocalisation. She made her début in 1815, upon the second-rate theatres, such as those of Brescia, Parma, and Leghorn; from that period till 1822, she struggled through the apprenticeship of her profession without any presage of her future celebrity. At that period, during the congress, she obtained a brilliant success at Verona. She then went to Paris, where she excited vast enthusiasm, and laid the foundation of a reputation never surpassed by any dramatic singer. Not that she ever attained very great perfection in her vocalisation, or her method of throwing out her voice; but she had the most wonderful gift of assimilating herself to every character; there was in her accents something so penetrating, so indescribably touching, that she possessed unlimited command over the feelings of her audience. She gave the deepest study to her art, and every representation seemed to mark a progress. She first appeared in the character of Desdemona, in London, in March, 1824. This was always one of her finest parts; and some years afterwards furnished a subject for comparison with Madame Malibran, with whom it was also a favourite rôle. If the latter, in her vocal execution and the pure feeling of music, had an incontestable advantage, nobody could deny to Madame Pasta a higher conception, more unity, and, in a word, a truer expression of the unfortunate Venetian.

In 1829, Madame Pasta purchased a beautiful country-seat near lake Como; and after passing her summers there for some years, she at length appeared to give up the stage, having lived quietly for three years in this agreeable retreat. When in 1840 she accepted proposals from the Russian court to go to St. Petersburg, the emoluments given her for that season were fixed at 40,000 dollars of our money.

Madame Pasta has received more praise, and awakened more enthusiasm, than any actress of the age. Bellini wrote Norma and the Sonnambula expressly for her; in the latter, it was surprising to see her admirable in a simplicity so very different from the stately parts in which she generally excelled. Her Anna Bolena exhibits an energy and dignity which have served as a model to all subsequent actresses.

PFEIFFER, MADAME,

Has distinguished herself in a very remarkable manner by travelling alone on a journey around the globe. We give the account, taken from a letter of the Rev. J. Perkins, American Missionary at Oroomiah, Persia, who thus details her adventures:—

"On the 1st of August, 1848, a knocking at the door of our mission premises was soon followed by the quick step of a native, who came to Dr. Wright with the statement that there stood in the street a woman, who knew no language, and was entirely unattended, except by a Koordish muleteer. A moment afterward, another native came with the additional statement, the lady is dressed in English clothes, and she says in your language, Will you give me a little water?"

"Dr. Wright, whose curiosity and astonishment could hardly be otherwise than highly excited, by the announcement of a lady in European costume, speaking English, in the street, at night, and unattended, in this remote, barbarous land, where the appearance of a European man is a thing of very rare occurrence, soon had ocular proof of what his ears were so reluctant to admit—a bona fide European lady standing before him, having a letter for Mr. Stocking from an acquaintance of his at Mosul, which introduced us to Madame Pfeiffer, of Vienna, who had performed the circuit of the world, thus far, alone, and was now hastening toward her home.

"Who, then, is Madame Pfeiffer? She is a German lady, fifty-one years old, of great intelligence, and most perfect accomplishments, and, to appearance, thoroughly sane on every subject, unless it be her style of travelling, which is at least somewhat peculiar.

"Madame Pfeiffer, leaving her husband and her two sons, (one of them an officer of government and the other an artist,) started in 1846 on her tour around the world. An aged gentleman of her acquaintance accompanied her for a short time; but finding that she was obliged to protect him instead of his protecting her, she left him, and proceeded entirely alone.

"From Europe, Madame Pfeiffer went to Brazil, where she admired the brilliant flowers and the magnificent forests more than almost any thing else that she had seen, and where she came very near being murdered by a black ruffian, who attempted to rob her. She still carries the scars of the wounds then received, but states, with evident satisfaction, that she had cut off three of his fingers, in self-defence, when several persons providentially came to her rescue. She had intended to cross the continent, from Rio to the Pacific ocean; but finding things in too disordered a state to admit of it, she took passage in a sailing vessel at Rio, in which she doubled Cape Horn, and went to Chili; and after a short stay at Valparaiso, she took passage in another vessel for Tahiti, where she made an agreeable visit, among the mementos of which she has Queen Pomare's autograph.

"From Tahiti, our heroine traveller proceeded to China, where she visited several of the points most accessible to foreigners, mingling socially with the missionaries there, whom she mentions familiarly by name, as Dr. Bridgeman, Dr. Ball, Mr. Gutzlaff, &c.; the autograph of the last named of whom she has in Chinese. One of the strongest impressions which she seems to have brought from the 'celestial empire' is, the imminent insecurity of foreigners at Canton.

"From China, Madame Pfeiffer went to Calcutta; and from that city, she travelled overland, across British India, to Bombay, passing through a great variety of incidents and adventures on the way, and holding much pleasant intercourse with Protestant missionaries, (though herself born and educated a Catholic,) at various stations and of different nations.

"From Bombay, Madame Pfeiffer went in a steamer to Bussorah; and thence, in another steamer, up to Bagdad; and from Bagdad, she travelled in company with a caravan up to Mosul, as a memento of which place she has a sculptured figure of the human head, taken from the ruins of ancient Nineveh. From Mosul, she crossed the formidable Koordish mountains to Oroomiah—a caravan journey of twelve days, (but protracted, in her case, by tedious delays, to twenty days,) in company with a Koordish muleteer, on a route of greater exposure, humanly speaking, than any other she has travelled during her circuit of the world.

"After a visit of one day with us, which we all wished could have been longer, Madame Pfeiffer hastened on toward Tabreez, intending to go thence through Georgia to Tiflis, and thence across the Caucasus, through European Russia, to Vienna, hoping to reach her home about the first of November.

"The adventurous circumstances of Madame Pfeiffer, during many parts of her tour, invest it with the most romantic and thrilling interest. Think, for instance, in her passage across the wild Koordish mountains, of a savage Koord pointing to the tassel on the Turkish fez (cap) she wore, to which he took a fancy, and demanding it of her by the significant gesture of drawing his hand across his throat—meaning, of course, "Give me the tassel as you value your head;" and she, in turn, repelling the demand, by gestures, unable to speak to him a word orally, in any language he could understand. Through many such adventures she made her way safely to Oroomiah, carrying about her person a large sum of money, (by accidental necessity rather than choice,) over the wild regions of Koordistan, in a manner which seems to us truly marvellous. Her practical motto is, never betray fear; and to her strict adherence to that, she expresses herself as greatly indebted for her success in travelling.

"On the road, Madame Pfeiffer, in these regions, wears the large veil, concealing most of the person, which is commonly worn here by native females, when they go abroad, and rides astride, as they also ride; but her other garments, (with the exception of the Turkish cap above named,) are sufficiently European, in appearance, to distinguish her from natives. Her language, on the way, in these lands, is wholly the language of signs, dictated by necessity, and which she seems often to have made very expressive. On the last day's ride, before reaching Oroomiah, for instance, the stage being two ordinary stages, and the muleteer, at one time, proposing to halt till the next day, she would rest her head upon her hand, as emblematical of sleep, and repeat Oroomiah; and when the muleteer, from regard to his tired horses, still insisted on halting, she added tears to her gestures; and the obstinate Koord's heart, according to his own statement, was then irresistibly subdued—so much so, that he went promptly and cheerfully. Her helplessness and dependence, on well known principles, did much, doubtless, at once to win for her kindness among the bloody Koords, and ward off danger. Madame Pfeiffer has, however, intrinsic elements of a good traveller. Though she had rode, on the day she reached Oroomiah, almost incessantly, from one o'clock, A. M., till eight o'clock, P. M., at the wearisome rate of a caravan, over a very dry, hot, dusty region, a distance of near sixty miles, still, on her arrival, she seemed little tired—was buoyant and cheerful as a lark, (which is probably her habitual temperament,) and was quite ready, the next day, (the only day she stopped with us,) to take a pleasure ride on Mount Seir.

"Madame Pfeiffer occupies but a single horse on her journey; her small trunk being swung on one side of the animal, and her scanty bed on the other, and she riding between them. Her fare on the road, moreover, is extremely simple—consisting of little more than bread and milk—a regimen not more convenient to the traveller, on the score of economy, than conducive, as she says, to her health, and certainly to her security. To those who may be curious in regard to the expenses of her tour round the world, I may repeat her statement, that she had expended, when here, just about one thousand dollars.

"A passion for travel is the ruling motive that carries Madame Pfeiffer so cheerfully and courageously through all her manifold hardships and perils. She, however, has minor objects—makes large collections of insects and flowers. She is already an authoress of some celebrity, having published a work on Iceland, and another on Syria and the Holy Land, the fruits of her earlier travel; and the copious notes and observations which she is making during her tour around the world, will, of course, in due time be given to the world. ‘A small affair,’ she pertinently remarked, ‘would it have been for me to sail around the world, as many have done; it is my land journeys that render my tour a great undertaking, and invest it with interest.’

“Madame Pfeiffer expressed her purpose, after visiting home and resting a while, of taking North America in her next tour. Possibly, this female Ledyard will meet with some, in our native land, under whose eye this notice may fall; if so, we would bespeak for her their kind offices, and pledge them, in return, a rare entertainment in making her acquaintance.”

Madame Pfeiffer reached her home in safety, where she has since remained.

PEIRSON, LYDIA JANE,

Was born in Middletown, Connecticut. Her father, William Wheeler, was a man of education and of a poetic turn of mind, and from him his daughter probably inherited her genius. From her earliest years, Miss Wheeler displayed that fondness for poetry and music which was to characterize her after life, and almost in her infancy was accustomed to compose verses, and sing them to little wild airs of her own. These first songs were all of God and nature, she being, like almost all children of genius, of a devotional cast of mind and exquisitely sensible of beauty. Her powers of memory were unusually great; and in several instances she learned by heart whole books, such as Falconer's Shipwreck, The Lady of the Lake, Lalla Rookh, Byron's Bride of Abydos, Corsair, &c. Although Miss Wheeler began to write at such an early age, she did not publish any of her productions till after her marriage, esteeming, with a modesty natural to a refined and sensitive mind, her own writings too insignificant to interest any one. When she was fifteen years of age, her parents removed to Canandaigua, New York; and two years after, Miss Wheeler was married to Mr. Peirson, of Cazenovia, and removed with her husband into the unsettled wilds of Tioga county, Penn., where she has passed the last twenty years.

During the first years of her utter loneliness and seclusion in the forest, being shut out from society and almost without books, her pen was her only solace—the charm that alone warded off despondency and gloom. Mrs. Peirson wrote from no pecuniary motives, though for many years her children were chiefly dependent on her efforts; but because the spirit of poetry which filled her breast would compel an utterance; and in that she found sweet relief from her many cares. She has written much—chiefly for magazines and newspapers. Her published poems would fill more than a thousand common octavo pages, and the half that she has written is yet unpublished. Her published prose exceeds her poems, two pages to one, and amongst it all there cannot be found a bad or worthless article. Her prose papers have never been collected; but she has published two volumes of poems—“Forest Leaves,” in 1845, and “The Forest Minstrel,” in 1847. Her writings are characterized by ease, grace, delicacy, and beauty, bearing marks of a genuine and sincere love of nature, and are evidently the outpourings of an earnest soul, full of deep and strong sensibilities. In 1849, she edited the Lancaster Literary Gazette with much success. None of our female writers have surmounted so many impediments in their literary career as Mrs. Peirson.

From “Forest Leaves.”

OLD TREES.

It was a wilderness,

A wild dark forest of old patriarch trees,
Gigantic trees, of which no living man
Could say, I saw them when their trunks were less,
Their heads less high than now. Moss-grown, and grey;
They stood, the monuments of ages past;
Engrav'd in characters which every eye
May read and understand, with one great name.
The name of Him who rear'd them; of all else
As desert ruins silent, save at times
When spirits from the far mysterious past
Come back like children to a household hearth,
And mourn for all the beautiful and dear
That come no more to meet them. Then a voice
Of strange dark sighing heaves the heavy robes
Above their stern old hearts.

WOMEN IN THE WILDERNESS.

Dost thou know

How fares the forest dweller, in her hut
Of unhewn logs, erected hastily,
With windows all unglaz'd, and roof of bark,
Through which the rain drops trickle, and the storm
Looks down upon the sleeper? Hast thou known
The stern privation, and the cruel want
That make themselves at home in such abodes,
And cast their shadows between heart and heart,
Excluding love's warm sunlight, till the blooms
That look to it for life grow pale and die?
If thou dost know these things, I need not tell
The painful story. If thou knowest not,
'Twere vain to tell, for thou canst not believe.—
She was still young, and on her face and form
The magic light of beauty linger'd still:
The rose was on her cheek; but o'er her brow
There lay a shadow, even when she smiled,
The fearful shadow which a darken'd heart
Throws on the sunshine of the spirit's joy
And those blue eyes—the dewy tenderness
Of heaven dwelt still within them, and bright forms
Of human sympathies lay tremblingly
Amid their troubled waters,—and her voice
Had in its cadence that complaining tone,
With which the heart, that will not be belied,
Tells its own story.

THE MOTHER.

It was a winter eve.

The fire was blazing brightly on the hearth
Within a rural dwelling. She was there,
But, oh! no longer young or beautiful;
For toil, and sorrow, and the restlessness
With which strong spirits struggle with their bonds
Like those wild mighty birds that will not brook
The chains they cannot sever; these had touch'd
The grace and beauty of her form and face,
But in her eyes the spirit liv'd and spake,
And dazzled as of old. Around her sat
A band of children, and with gentle voice

She gave familiar lessons, teaching them
The gentle virtues, knitting their young hearts
In one sweet bond of love; and leading thus
Their willing minds by easy flowery paths
Toward the hill of science. Still she plied
Her needle all the while, with busy hand,
And oftentimes, amid her cheerful words,
Sigh'd all unconsciously — then smiled again,
And spoke to them of hope, and coming years,
Bright with the beams that always shine from heaven
Upon the path of piety and truth.

THE POETESS.

Her task was done. The evening prayers were said,
The good night spoken, and the kiss exchang'd,
And she was left alone. She brought her pen
And spread before her the unsullied sheet,
On which she thought to trace the imagings
Of bright and sportive fancies. But her hand
Was cold and weary, and her heart was sad.
Beside her lay a page on which her name
Was printed with high honours as a bard
Well worthy of a place amid the band,
Of which her country boasts. So she had won
The meed she coveted, the wreath of Fame,
And now she felt the utter worthlessness
Of such a glittering toy. It had no power
To still the painful throbbings of her heart,
To cool the fever of her troubled brain,
Or satisfy the yearnings of her soul—
She droop'd her face upon her folded hands,
And wept, oh! long and bitterly.

THE SHADOWS OF THE PAST.

The Shadows of the Past! Oh, dim and pale,
They linger in the paths where joy has been;
And Memory lifts at times oblivion's veil,
And lights the vista with her magic sheen,
Till stricken hearts go mad, and call in vain
On joys, that ne'er can thrill her chords again.

The Shadows of the Past! Oh, beautiful
In the deserted bowers of bliss they stand;
So gentle-ey'd, so meekly sorrowful,
Extending toward us the familiar hand;
Oh! we would bribe Heaven's mercy, to restore
Those blessed angels to our arms once more.

The Shadows of the Past! Oh, sad they seem,
With wither'd rose-buds braided in their hair,
And broken tablets of the heart's young dream,
Oh! precious were the hopes dissever'd there;
Woe to the weary heart, which, all undone,
Looks back and weeps—and wanders darkly on!

TO SLEEP.

Yes, come, for I am weary, and would feel
Thy breath of balm upon my fever'd brow;
Soft to my couch thy breezy footsteps steal,
Oh, gentle soother! thou art welcome now.

How quietly thou glidest from thy bower
Of silken poppies, in the shadowy vale,
Where Lethe's waters press the silent shore,
And drooping plants their dreamy breath exhale!

Now lay thy velvet hand upon mine eyes,
Shut out the world, and calm my throbbing brain;
Then from the twilight land of mysteries,
I pray thee, beckon thine enchanted train.

Shadows of gentle memories, dress'd by thee
In radiant tissue of immortal light;
And yet with semblance of reality,
And all familiar to my mental sight.

All forms of Love, and Truth, and holy Hope,
That laid their short-liv'd offerings on my heart,
When I believ'd that flowers would never droop,
And braided roses never fall apart.

Oh, simple faith of girlhood Purer, far,
Than the cold worship of the world-wise hear.,
Which desolate, and seam'd with many a scar,
Conceals its anguish with a veil of art.

Thy dewy fingers only can restore
The faded treasures of life's blessed morn:
And weave around the heart, which hopes no more,
Sweet garlands of the rose that wears no thorn.

PHELPS, ALMIRA H. LINCOLN.

Was born in Berlin, Connecticut, in 1793. The character of her father, Samuel Hart, is described in the memoir of her elder sister, Mrs. Emma Willard. Her mother was Lydia Hinsdale, a woman of great energy and sound judgment. Almira, the youngest of a large family, was indulged in childhood; but love of knowledge, and an ambition to excel, induced her, as she grew older, to seek her chief pleasure and occupation in intellectual pursuits and moral improvement; religious truths, also, early exercised great influence over her. She was, for some years, the pupil of her sister Emma, and after the marriage of the latter to Dr. Willard, passed two years with her in Middlebury, Vermont. When about eighteen, she spent a year, as a pupil, at the then celebrated school of her relative, Miss Hinsdale, in Pittsfield, Massachusetts. She married, not long after, Simeon Lincoln, who succeeded William L. Stone as editor of the "Connecticut Mirror," in Hartford, Connecticut.

At the age of thirty, Mrs. Lincoln was left a widow, with two children, and with two perplexed estates, those of her husband and his father, to settle, which she successfully accomplished. At that time, she began the study of the Latin and Greek languages and the natural sciences, and also applied herself to improving her talent for drawing and painting, in order to prepare herself for assisting her sister, Mrs. Willard, in the Troy Seminary, where she passed seven years, engaged in alternate study and instruction.

In 1831, Mrs. Lincoln married the Hon. John Phelps, a distinguished lawyer of Vermont, in which State she resided for the next six years. In 1839, she was called on to assume the office of Principal of the West Chester (Pa.) Female Seminary, which invitation she accepted; she subsequently removed to the Patapsco Female Institute, near Ellicott's Mills, Maryland, where she now presides over one of the most flourishing and best-conducted institutions of the country. Mr. Phelps, by whose assistance and advice his wife had been aided and guided in establishing the Institute, died in 1849.

The first work published by Mrs. Phelps was her larger Botany, generally known as "Lincoln's Botany," printed about 1829. Few scientific books have had a more general circulation than this, and, for the last twenty years, it has kept its place as the principal botanical class-book, notwithstanding numerous competitors. Her next work was a "Dictionary of Chemistry," which, though it purported to be a translation from the French, contains much, in the form of notes and an appendix, that is original. With the learned, this work gave the author great credit, as it evinced much research and a thorough knowledge of the science which it illustrated. After her second marriage, she prepared her "Botany" and "Chemistry for Beginners;" and also published a course of lectures on education, which had been addressed to the pupils of the Troy Seminary, and which now constitutes, under the title of the "Female Student, or Fireside Friend," one of the volumes of the "School Library," published by the Messrs. Harper. "This work," says an English publisher, in his advertisement to a second London edition, "deserves to be extensively circulated in this country (England). The author is one of the most distinguished writers on education. In America, great efforts are now making to improve female education, and Mrs. Phelps will be found an eloquent advocate for her sex."

A larger and smaller "Natural Philosophy, for Schools," a "Geology for Beginners," with a larger Chemistry, soon followed; and a translation of Madame Necker de Saussure's "Progressive Education," by Mrs. Willard and Mrs. Phelps, with notes, and "The Mother's Journal" as an appendix, by the latter, was published in 1838. Her next work was a small volume, "Caroline Westery, or the Young Traveller," which constitutes volume sixteen of Harpers' Boys' and Girls' Library for Beginners. The works we have enumerated were all written by Mrs. Phelps within about eight years, during the first two of which she was connected with the Troy Female Seminary, and much occupied by important duties connected with its supervision. During the six remaining years, she resided in Vermont, where she became the mother of a son and daughter, and presided over the household affairs of her home with tact and ability equal to those who make housekeeping the chief pursuit of their life. The only book published by Mrs. Phelps since she has been actively engaged in education, is "Ida Norman, or Trials and their Uses," which was written for the benefit of her pupils. Some of her addresses at the public examinations and commencements of the Institute have been published, and we understand that it is her intention soon to issue a volume of her addresses to her pupils on moral and religious subjects.

In her girlhood, Mrs. Phelps wrote occasional poetry, and commenced a record of her reading, observations, and the events of her life, which she has continued to the present time; and probably, had she chosen to court the muses rather than cultivate the sciences, she might have been equally successful. But it is as a teacher that her fine talents and good influence have been most beneficial to her sex and to her country. The office of instructress to the young is a mission of great power and responsibility, which Mrs. Phelps has fulfilled, and still continues to fulfil, in a manner deserving high honour. It was for her pupils that her scientific works were prepared; no woman in America, nor any in Europe, excepting Mrs. Marcet and Mrs. Somerville, has made such useful and numerous contributions to the stock of available scientific knowledge as Mrs. Phelps. Yet had she not been a teacher, and found the need of such works, it is very doubtful whether she would have prepared them.

WORKS OF FICTION.

Female writers have too often followed the leadings of imagination, without enquiring to what end its vagaries would tend. The fondness of the sex for reading works of fiction, is proverbial. But are not the authors of such works labouring to prepare for their readers that kind of food which, so far from rendering the mental system strong and healthy, disorders and enfeebles it? Novels and poetry are, indeed, the flowers of literature; they afford opportunity for the display of genius, and are pleasant companions for an idle or heavy hour. They may exhibit virtue in an attractive light, and inspire the reader with an enthusiasm to imitate the noble examples of heroes and heroines. But I would appeal to the experience of every romantic female, whether, after the excitement occasioned by the perusal of some fascinating novel, she has returned to the scenes of every-day life with a spirit calmed, and prepared to meet its realities with fortitude and resignation? or whether she has not, at such times, experienced a distaste, almost amounting to disgust, for the homely beings and scenes with which reality surrounded her? And has it not required a strong and painful effort to regain that mental equilibrium, so necessary for prudent conduct and amiable deportment?

"For yet, alas! the real ills of life
Claim the full vigour of a mind prepared,
Prepared for patient, long, laborious strife,
Its guide experience, and truth its guard."

The virtues which appear with eclat on the pages of fiction, are not the humble, unobtrusive ones of common life—those which, in reality, demand the greatest efforts, and exhibit the best-regulated minds; the trials which excite our sympathy in these creations of fancy, are seldom those of real life. False views are thus given of our own duties, and what we ought to expect from others.

MORAL INFLUENCE.

Those who are gifted with the power to influence the minds of their fellow-beings, should beware how they exert this influence. Is it enough that they amuse, astonish, and delight mankind? This, too, the mountebank or opera-dancer may do. But, as sure as there is a future state of existence, so there is a moral influence to be exerted by every human being according to the measure of his abilities. And where can this influence be more powerfully, more extensively exercised, than through the medium of the press? Although our voice be feeble, yet, if our testimony is on the side of truth, it may have an influence on the feeble-minded even greater than more powerful accents. It will be heard when we shall be removed to another tribunal than that of literary criticism, where the flashes of genius are too often preferred to the steady light of truth. But at that great tribunal we shall be judged according to the motives with which we have written, and not the ability with which we have executed our task.

EDUCATION.

The true end of education is to prepare the young for the active duties of life, and to enable them to fill with propriety those stations to which, in the providence of God, they may be called. This includes, also, a preparation for eternity; for we cannot live well without those dispositions of heart which are necessary to fit us for heaven. To discharge aright the duties of life requires not only that the intellect shall be enlightened, but that the heart shall be purified. A mother does not perform her whole duty, even when, in addition to providing for the wants of her children and improving their understanding, she sets before them an example of justice and benevolence, of moderation in her own desires, and a command over her own passions: this may be all that is required of a heathen mother; but the Christian female must go with her little ones to Jesus of Nazareth, to seek his blessing; she must strive to elevate the minds of her offspring by frequent reference to a future state; she must teach them to hold the world and its pursuits in subserviency to more important interests, and to prize above all things that peace which, as the world giveth not, neither can it take away.

ENERGY OF MIND.

Can we find no cause why the children of the rich, setting out in life under the most favourable circumstances, often sink into insignificance, while their more humble competitors, struggling against obstacles, rise higher and higher, till they become elevated in proportion to their former depression? Have we never beheld a plant grow weak and sickly from excess of care, while the mountain pine, neglected and exposed to fierce winds and raging tempests, took strong root and grew into a lofty tree, delighting the eye by its strength and beauty? If we look into our State Legislatures, our National Congress, and the highest executive and judicial offices in the country, we do not find these places chiefly occupied by those who were born to wealth, or early taught the pride of aristocratic distinctions. Most of the distinguished men of our country have made their own fortunes; most of them began life knowing that they could hope for no aid or patronage, but must rely solely upon the energies of their own minds and the blessing of God.

From "A Mother's Journal."

THE MOTHER'S HOPES.

Every mother hopes—she hopes that her infant will live to comfort and cheer her old age; to be good, and, it may be, great. As far as she is enlightened as to her maternal duties, and the means of realizing her fond hopes for her child, almost every mother exerts herself to do. What a pledge for virtuous conduct is the character of a mother! though she might trifle with her own reputation, can she endure the thought of bequeathing infamy to her offspring? May the time come when every virtuous child may proudly say, "Behold my mother!" and when every mother may joyfully say, "Behold my child!"

AN INFANT'S FIRST IDEAS.

The little actions of an infant seem so natural, that we can scarcely persuade ourselves to think they are worth comment. So, in the physical world mankind are prone to seek an explanation of uncommon phenomena only, while the ordinary changes of nature, which are in themselves equally wonderful, are disregarded. Comets and earthquakes had occupied the attention of inquirers long before any one had ever thought of asking what caused the falling of a stone, or how warmth was produced by the burning of cold substances. An infant cries after its mother;—this is natural, the mother believes; but why is it natural? It is because the child is endowed with a mental faculty, connecting its sensations with the object which gives rise to them, and which is capable of awakening emotions of affection that cluster around the being whose sight suggests ideas of kindness, protection, and sympathy. This faculty is association, which, like the attraction of gravitation in the planetary system, binds together the thoughts in a human soul. The mother ought to know that on the proper direction of this faculty depends the moral and religious character of her child, and that as soon as it can distinguish her from strangers, it is, by the operation of the same principle, capable of receiving impressions which may prove favourable or unfavourable to its future well-being. It is this consideration which renders the mother's office so important.

EFFECT OF EXCITEMENTS.

Strong excitements have an unfavourable effect upon the nerves of young children. We know this to be the case with ourselves, but are apt to forget that things which are common to us may be new and striking to them. My child was, on a certain evening, carried into a large room brilliantly lighted and filled with company. He gazed around with an expression of admiration and delight, and unmixed with perplexity; the latter, however, soon vanished, and he laughed and shouted with great glee; and as he saw that he was observed, exerted himself still farther to be amusing. He was then carried into a room where was music and dancing; this was entirely new, and he was agitated with a variety of emotions; fear, wonder, admiration, and joy seemed to prevail by turns. As the scene became familiar, he again enjoyed it without any mixture of unpleasant feelings.

But the effect of these excitements was apparent when he was taken to his bed-room; his face was flushed, as in a fever, his nervous system disturbed, and his sleep was interrupted by screams.

THE CHILD AND NATURE.

The expression of the emotions of young children, when first viewing the grand scenery of nature, affords a rich treat to the penetrating observer. At eight months old, my child, on being carried to the door during a fall of snow, contemplated the scene with an appearance of deep attention. He had learned enough of the use of his eyes to form some conception of the expanse before him, and to perceive how different it was from the narrow confines of the apartments of the house. The falling snow, with its brilliant whiteness and easy downward motion, was strange and beautiful; and when he felt it lighting upon his face and hands, he held up his open mouth, as if he would test its nature by a third sense.

A few weeks after this he was taken, on a bright winter's day, to ride in a sleigh: (this scene was in Vermont.) The sleigh-bells, the horses, the companions of his ride, the trees and shrubs loaded with their brilliant icy gems, the houses, and the people whom we passed, all by turns received his attention. If he could have described what he saw as it appeared to him, and the various emotions caused by these objects, the description would have added a new page in the philosophy of mind. How often are the beauties of nature unheeded by man, who, musing on past ills, brooding over the possible calamities of the future, building castles in the air, or wrapped up in his own self-love and self-importance, forgets to look abroad, or looks with a vacant stare. His outward senses are sealed, while a fermenting process may be going on in the passions within. But if, with a clear conscience, a love of nature, and a quick sense of the beautiful and sublime, we do contemplate the glorious objects so profusely scattered around us by a bountiful Creator, with the interesting changes which are constantly varying the aspect of these objects, still our emotions have become deadened by habit. We do not admire what is familiar to us, and therefore it is, that we must be ever ignorant of the true native sympathy between our own hearts and the external world.

From "Poems."

THE WONDERS OF NATURE.

The universe, how vast! exceeding far
The bounds of human thought; millions of suns,
With their attendant worlds moving around
Some common centre, gravitation strange!

Beyond the power of finite minds to scan!
Can He, who in the highest heav'n sublime,
Enthron'd in glory, guides these mighty orbs —
Can He behold this little spot of earth,
Lost 'midst the grandeur of the heavenly host.
Can God bestow one thought on fallen man?

Turn, child of ignorance and narrow views,
Thy wilder'd sight from off these dazzling scenes
Turn to thy earth, and trace the wonders there.
Who pencils, with such variegated hues,
The lowly flower that decks the rippling stream,
Or gorgeously attires the lily race?
Who, with attentive care each year provides
A germ to renovate the fading plant,
And gives soft show'rs and vivifying warmth,
Kindling within the embryo inert
The little spark of life, unseen by all,
Save him who gave it, and whose care preserves!
Who teaches, when this principle of life,
Thus animated, swells the germ within,
And bursts its tomb, rising to light and air —
Who teaches root and stem to find their place,
Each one to seek its proper element?

Who gilds the insect's wings, and leads it forth
To feast on sweets and bask in sunny ray?
None can the life of plant or insect give,
Save God alone; — He rules and watches all.
Scorns not the least of all His works; much less
Man, made in his image, destined to exist
When e'en yon brilliant worlds shall cease to be.
Then how should man, rejoicing in his God,
Delight in his perfections, shadow'd forth
In every little flow'r and blade of grass!
Each opening bud, and care-perfected seed,
Is as a page, where we may read of God.

R.

RACHEL.

As her name is only known in her theatrical profession, is of Jewish parentage, her father, M. Felix, being among the poorest of his tribe. Rachel Felix was the eldest of seven children, and early began to aid her parents in their severe struggle to gain subsistence for their family. Her career opened as a street singer: with an old guitar on which she played the accompaniment, the little Rachel went forth to win by her songs the bread she was unable to earn with her hands.

On a cold evening in January, about the year

1830, Choron, the founder of an academy for music in Paris, was charmed by the silver voice of a child singing out the most delightful cadences upon the keen wintry air. It was little Rachel "singing for her supper." Choron pressed through the crowd who were gathered around her, and in utter amazement gazed upon a delicate little girl of ten or twelve summers, thinly clad, and standing in the snow, the very image of desolation. With her benumbed finger she held out a wooden bowl for a sou, and in it Choron dropped a silver coin. His heart was touched, and the deepest feelings of interest for the little warbler were awakened.

"My child," he asked, "who taught you to sing so well?"

"Nobody, sir!" said the little girl, while her teeth chattered; "I have learnt just as I could."

"But where did you learn those beautiful airs which you sing, and which I do not know?"

"Indeed, sir, I have learnt a little of them everywhere. When I go about the streets I listen under the windows to those ladies and gentlemen who sing. I try to catch the airs and the words, and afterwards arrange them the best way I can."

"You are cold and hungry; come with me, and I will give you food and clothing," said the good Choron; and the crowd clapped their hands. But they lost their little Rachel—she never again sang on the Boulevards. Choron obtained permission of her parents to give her a musical education, and under his tuition her wonderful vocal powers rapidly developed. Death took away her benefactor, and she returned awhile to her miserable parents.

The little girl was then just budding into the bloom of a graceful and fascinating woman. She looked to the stage as the means of obtaining bread, and succeeded in making an engagement at the Gymnase, one of the minor theatres of Paris. She made no impression; the audiences refused to applaud. She was disappointed, but not discomfited. From an old clothes-merchant of her own race she borrowed an odd volume of Racine, and was charmed with the tragedy of Andromache. She recited the part of the daughter of Helene; her eyes filled with the tears of deep emotion, and she said to her mother, "I know my destiny—I will perform tragedy."

Through the influence of a retired actor she obtained an engagement at the Theatre Française, and her appearance in the characters of Racine was greeted with immense applause. The Parisians were in ecstasies. The singing-girl of the Boulevards was apotheosized as the "Tragic Muse." Her salary was first fixed at 4000 francs: the second season it was raised to 150,000 francs. The courts of France and England soon delighted to pay her homage; and within ten years from the hour when Choron took her half frozen from the streets of Paris, she wore a gorgeous diamond necklace, with the words "VICTORIA TO RACHEL" emblazoned upon it!

Mademoiselle Rachel is at the head of her profession as a tragic actress, and her annual income is not far from thirty-five thousand dollars. Like Jenny Lind in another public sphere, she has no peer in her profession or the admiration of the votaries of the drama. She might have been one of the greatest of living singers, but she preferred to aim at the highest tragic eminence. That she has accomplished.

Would that we could add—what may be truly said of the sweet singer of Sweden—"Mademoiselle Rachel bears a spotless reputation!" It could hardly be expected, accustomed as the poor little girl was to scenes of misery and low vice in such a licentious city as Paris, that Rachel would grow up with much natural delicacy of feeling; but genius should have a purifying power, giving moral elevation of sentiment to the soul of a woman. No doubt calumny has exaggerated the reports of Mademoiselle Rachel's amours; nor ought she to be judged by the standard of a Sidons, who was born and trained in a land where female chastity is required as the crowning grace of the actress. Still we do regret that a shadow has fallen on the fair fame of one who might have been, like Jenny Lind, a glory to her sex as well as to her profession. But let us record her good deeds. Mademoiselle Rachel is said to be very charitable to the poor. She has provided generously for her own family; educating her sisters and brothers, and never forgetting the humble condition from which she has risen. As a memorial of her street-minstrelsy, she religiously preserves her old guitar.

REYBAUD, MADAME CHARLES,

Is the nomme de plume of Mademoiselle H. Arnaud. She resides in Paris. Why she should have chosen to put away her own name, and give the celebrity of her genius to a fictitious one, has never been made known; but such is the fact. She need not have done this in order to secure the success of her works, which have been received with great favour by the Parisian public.

Madame Reybaud has published over twenty different novels and tales, none of which have failed. Her most striking qualities are the unity and perfectness with which she constructs and finishes her plot, each incident and dialogue tending to the completion of the plan; and so ingeniously does she sometimes contrive the story, that the most experienced novel-reader is taken by surprise in the unforeseen denouement. Like all who write much, she has produced books of very unequal merit, but the best exhibit both tenderness and wit; and what must be highly commended, because more rare in French novels, there is nothing extravagant in sentiment or offensive to morals to be found in her works. An able English critic has truly said, "Madame Charles Reybaud, little known to English readers, is a good and captivating writer of considerable ability. Her numerous productions may be perused without fear by the conscientious and scrupulous reader. We are doing them a service in recommending this interesting author to their notice. She will cheer many a winter evening, and the pleasant languor of a July noon; she will occupy very agreeably the odd hour between the return from the drive and the appearance at the dinner-table. Her intentions and tendencies are good; her sentiments very sweet and delicate; a strong sense of religious and moral responsibility evidently pervades her mind. She introduces her readers to the antique relics of that beautiful and graceful aristocracy—let us give all their due—which was destroyed by the first French revolution."

We subjoin the titles of her most popular works, commending as our favourites, "Les deux Marguerites," "Sans Dot," and "Espagnoles et Françaises." The others are,—"Dona Marianna," "Fabiana," "Geraldine," "Lena," "Madame de Rieux," "Mademoiselle de Chazeuil," "Marie d'Enambue," "Mézélie," "Misé Brun," "La Pauvre Paysanne," "La Petite Reine," "Romans du Cœur," and "Valdepeiras."

ROBINSON, THERESE ALBERTINE LOUISE,

WIFE of the accomplished scholar, Professor Robinson, of New York, was born on the 26th of January, 1797, at Halle, Germany. She was the daughter of Professor L. H. von Jacob, a man distinguished for his learning. In 1806, her father became a Professor at the Russian University of Charkow. Here he remained five years, during which time his daughter began the study of the Slavonic languages and literature. Here she also wrote her first poems, afterwards published under the name of Talvi, a title composed of the initials of her maiden name, Therese Albertine Louise von Jacob. In 1811 her father was transferred to St. Petersburg, and her studies were principally confined to the modern languages; but she also devoted part of her time to historical reading, and to the cultivation of her poetical talent. Her industry was intense and incessant. In 1816 her father returned to Halle, when she found an opportunity to acquire the Latin language. In 1825 she published at Halle several tales, under the title of "Psyche," with the signature of Talvi. In 1822 she translated Walter Scott's "Covenanters" and "Black Dwarf," under the name of Ernst Berthold. An accidental circumstance attracted her attention to the Servian literature, and so interested her in it that she learned that language and translated a number of poems, which she published in 1826 in two volumes, entitled "Popular Songs of the Servians."

In 1828 she was married to Professor Robinson, and after some time accompanied him to America. Here, after studying the aboriginal languages with great interest, she translated into the German Mr. Pickering's work on the Indian tongues of North America. This was published at Leipzig in 1834. During the same year she published an English work called an "Historical View of the Slavic Languages," which was afterwards translated into the German. In 1837 she returned with her husband and children to Germany, where she remained for two or three years, during which time she published at Leipzig a work entitled an "Attempt at an Historical Characterization of the Popular Songs of the Germanic Nations, with a Review of the Songs of the Extra-European Races." About the same time she published a work in German on "The Falseness of the Songs of Ossian."

After her return to America her time was principally devoted to the study of American history. The result was, "A History of John Smith," published in F. Raumer's Historisches Taschenbuch in 1845, and a larger historical work on the "Colonization of New England," published at Leipzig in 1847. Mrs. Robinson was induced to write this work from her strong desire to make the Germans acquainted with the history of the United States previous to the Revolution, of which they are quite ignorant. It is a production showing great research and judgment.

Mrs. Robinson's next works were written in English; the one published in 1850, entitled an "Historical Review of the Languages and Literature of the Slavic Nations, with a Sketch of their Popular Poetry," was originally prepared for, and appeared in, the Biblical Repository; a theological periodical started by her husband, Professor Robinson. She afterwards revised and partly re-wrote it. It is considered the most interesting and complete work in existence on the literature of the Slavonic nations. In the same year a small novel appeared,—"Heloise, or the Unrevealed Secret,"—published by the Appletons in New York, and simultaneously in Germany. This work is instructive as well as interesting, from the insight it affords into social life in Germany, and the manner in which the Russian government is administered in Caucasus, and the wild warfare of those regions carried on. In 1851 she published, through the Appletons, "Life's Discipline; a Tale of the Annals of Hungary."

The writings of this accomplished and excellent woman all show the highest attainments in literature, an unprejudiced mind, a clear and just judgment, a strong and comprehensive understanding, and a highly poetical temperament. Goethe speaks with great admiration of her poems, both original and translated. Her novels are superior both in style and interest to the ordinary publications of that class; her last work especially is valuable for the power of its incidents and the light it throws on the Magyar character and the incipient causes of the late revolution in Hungary. Mrs. Robinson is now a contributor to the German and American periodicals.

From "Life's Discipline."

SELFISHNESS.

Not the untamed passion of the human heart, which, bursting out into a flame, spreading ruinously, destroys all barriers; not the unbridled force, which, in wild outbreaks of savage roughness, crushes under foot tender blossoms, lovely flowers,—not these constitute the greatest, the truest evil of the world; it is cold, creeping egotism, heartless selfishness; which, with its attendant, treachery, deceit, and hypocrisy, easily bears away the palm, because it knows what it is doing, while passion, in blind fury, shatters its own weapons.

LOVING UNWORTHILY.

The greatest misery which can befall a woman is to love a bad man. The true essence of her love is the total abnegation of her own will; the immersion of all self-dependence in the self of the beloved object. Woe to the heart if it then falls out with the better qualities of mankind! Losing her faith in the moral worth of the man she loves a woman loses all the happiness of love. As long as the better element is not entirely lost in him, if it is, perhaps, the rough power of a passion, whatever be its name, that ruined him, if the brute has perhaps gained in him the momentary ascendancy over the man, and drags him to the depth of destruction, or even into the slime of low vulgarity; in this case, it seems almost as if, beside the lost esteem, there might still exist in the tenderest heart an affection for the ruined object. It is only that the flame does not shine any more! no more with magic brightness illumines the world around it. That it can only, like a deceptive heap of secretly glowing embers, consume the heart which harbours it against its will. But fatal to every loving weakness in a woman's breast is creeping treachery; calculating, deluding craftiness, when she has once recognised them under their mask. In the cold hands of low egotism the heart turns to ice. Love is dead. We are cured,—but are we happy?

GRIEF AND GUILT.

If it is true that constant change and the charm of novelty, the ceaseless rolling on of events around us, the attraction of the beautiful which we discover in a new, strange world, can at last strengthen and heal the most deeply wounded heart, as long as it is grief which has enfeebled it; this is not so when guilt has weighed it down: the sting of conscience cannot be withdrawn with all the exertion of our will: we cannot escape that pursuing monitress even in the most impetuous whirl of changing events and experiences!

THE SOUL'S POWER.

For not the actions themselves are what gives worth to man or takes it from him; what should gain him our approbation or draw upon him our contempt. Only when we have learned to know well the way which the soul has taken before it arrived at its aim, the deed; only when we are aware what outward powers have influenced the formation of the inward resolution; what seed education and early powerful circumstances have strown in each human heart, and in what degree Providence has made it susceptible for such seed; then only may we judge, admire, and approve, or condemn.

S.

SCACERNI-PROSPERI, ANGELA,

Of Ferrara, is descended from a family in which learning and learned men abounded. Carefully educated at home by her father, she was, in her early youth, well versed in general history, geography, geometry, and the French and Latin languages, and also displayed a turn for the fine arts. Her parents removed from Ferrara and resided for some time in Tuscany, where Angela had still greater opportunities for mental improvement, of which she took advantage. She was received into the Academy Clementina of Fine Arts in Bologna, and having returned with her father to her native country, was enrolled among the members of the Academy Ariosteia. Then, having become the wife of the Count Michel Fausto Prosperi, and the mother of several children, she devoted herself entirely to her domestic duties. She is universally beloved by all who know her, and her country willingly grants to her that veneration and respect which belong to her merits. She is an easy, harmonious, and graceful writer. Her works consist of many lyric poems, songs, epigrams, and sonnets, written with great sweetness and learning, and a touching Elegy on Guido Villa, formerly President of the hospital of St. James and Anna in Ferrara.

SCACRATI-ROMAGNOLI, ORINTIA,

Was born at Cesena, and, from her girlhood, has been distinguished for intelligence. In youth her beauty was remarkable; this, added to her highly cultivated mind, made her society sought for in the most brilliant circles. She was endowed with great penetration into character, tact and discretion. Circumstances led her to a country life for some years; she there devoted herself to literature, and wrote several dramatic pieces. She afterwards established herself at Rome, where she enjoyed the admiration of all, and the esteem of a large circle of friends. To foreigners she exercised a generous hospitality, and her name is known to many illustrious travellers of other nations. Her works, in four volumes, were published in 1810.

SCHOPPE, AMALIA VON,

WHOSE maiden name was Weise, is a German novel-writer who has distinguished herself for the number of her works, comprising about 150 volumes. We know little of her private history except from her own pen. In 1838 she published "Erinnerungen aus meinem Leben," which is said to contain many incidents of her own life, and portraying her own character under that of her heroine, Clementine. "If so," says a British critic, "she presents herself to the public as a woman of no ordinary character; intelligent, but unimpassioned; of a frank and energetic disposition, and devoid of prudery and false sentiment." Her first work was published in 1829, and as she has written at the rate of six or seven volumes per year, it is not strange that the same critic should observe that "Madame von Schoppe is a woman of talent, though her works are hastily planned and imperfectly finished." Her historical tales show extensive reading; among these, the collection entitled "Myosotis," published in 1841, attracted considerable attention. A son of Madame von Schoppe is also an author.

SEDGWICK, CATHARINE MARIA,

Was born in Stockbridge, Massachusetts. Her father, the Honorable Theodore Sedgwick, a citizen of high reputation, was at one time Speaker of the House of Representatives, afterwards senator in Congress, and, at the time of his death, filled the office of judge of the supreme court of his state. Miss Sedgwick's first book, the "New England Tale," appeared in 1822. It was originally written for a religious tract; but as it gradually expanded into a work too large for such a purpose, she was prevailed on, with much difficulty, by her friends to give it to the world in its present form.

It was received with such favour, that in 1827 the authoress was induced to publish her second work; a novel in two volumes, entitled "Redwood." This work met with great success, and was republished in England and translated into French and Italian. One of the characters in the book, Miss Debby Lennox, bears the stamp both of originality and truthfulness; and if it stood alone, would prove not only the extensive observation, but the great powers of invention possessed by its delineator. Miss Sedgwick's next work was "Hope Leslie, or Early Times in America;" a novel in two volumes, published in 1827. This has continued to be her most popular tale; and, indeed, no novel written by an American, except, perhaps, the early works of Cooper, ever met with such success. The character of the heroine is a lovely embodiment of womanhood with all its ideal perfections, and yet with a few natural weaknesses which only render her the more lifelike and interesting. The Indian girl, Magawisca, seems to be more a being of the imagination; too high-souled and lofty, as well as too refined to be a true type of the race from which she sprung. In 1830, "Clarence, a Tale of our own Times," appeared; in 1832 "Le Bossu," one of the Tales of Glauber Spa, and in 1835, "The Linwoods, or Sixty Years Since, in America." During the same year she collected in one volume the shorter tales which had appeared in different periodicals; and in 1836 she published her popular story of "The Poor Rich Man and the Rich Poor Man;" in 1837 "Live and Let Live;" in 1838 "Means and Ends, or Self-Training;" and afterwards, "A Love Token for Children," and "Stories for Young Persons." In 1840 she published her "Letters from Abroad to Kindred at Home," in two volumes; and not long after a "Life of Lucretia M. Davidson." She has also been a frequent contributor to annuals and periodicals. For the Lady's Book she wrote her thrilling novel, "Wilton Harvey." In the same Magazine was published "A Huguenot Family," "Scenes from Life in Town," "Fanny McDermot," &c. These will appear in the new edition of Miss Sedgwick's works now in course of publication. A writer in the National Portrait Gallery thus truly estimates the characteristics of her genius.

"It is evident that Miss Sedgwick's mind inclines towards cheerful views of life. There seems to be implanted in her heart a love of goodness and of the beautiful, which turns as naturally towards serenity and joy, as flowers lean towards the sun. It is manifest that though possessing great refinement herself, her sympathies are not confined to a coterie or class, but that they are called forth by every manifestation of virtue, even in the most humble circumstances, and that she looks with kind regard upon those gleams of a better nature which occasionally break forth amid prevailing clouds and darkness.

"She affects no indifference to the accidental advantages of condition. It would be impossible to diminish her interest in the powers and fascinations of genius and imagination, and she thinks it no duty to attempt it. But her highest favour and affection are reserved for that enduring virtue which is perfected through much trial and tribulation, and which needs no earthly witness or outward reward. She delights to see the "signet of hope upon the brow of infancy;" but she remembers with more satisfaction the last smile of unfaltering faith and love, which even death itself spares for a season.

"It is impossible to speak of her works without a particular regard to their moral and religious character. We know no writer of the class to which she belongs who has done more to inculcate just religious sentiments. They are never obtruded, nor are they ever suppressed. It is not the religion of observances, nor of professions, nor of articles of faith, but of the heart and life. It always comes forth; not as something said or done from a sense of necessity or duty, but as part of the character, and inseparable from its strength, as well as from its grace and beauty. It is a union of that faith which works by love with that charity which never faileth.

"There is another characteristic of Miss Sedgwick's writings which should not be overlooked. We allude to their great good sense and practical discretion; the notableness which they evince and recommend. This is so true, that we recollect having heard a zealous 'utilitarian declare, after reading one of her works, that political economy might be taught to the greatest advantage through the medium of romances."

Her style is peculiarly good; equally free from stiffness and negligence, it is more distinguished by delicacy and grace than strength, and the purity of her English may afford a model to some of our learned scholars.

Miss Sedgwick is evidently an ardent admirer of nature, and excels in describing natural scenery. She has also great powers both of invention and imagination, and delineates character with wonderful skill. Her children are, to a certain point, beautifully and naturally described; but there are in the mind of this writer two antagonistic principles:—the usefully practical, and the sentimentally romantic. This is by no means uncommon with delicate and refined minds; they like to deviate into regions beyond the every-day world, yet sense and circumstances recall them to common truths; hence arise little discrepancies which mar in some degree the naturalness of the delineations. Miss Edgeworth is almost the only writer of children's books who has entirely avoided this fault; but it is difficult to arrive at this excellence, and it is no disparagement to Miss Sedgwick to say she has not attained it. With every abatement that can be made, Miss Sedgwick remains among the front rank of those earnest and sincere writers whose talents have been employed for the purpose of doing good, and whose works have obtained a great and deserved popularity. Her books have, almost without exception, been reprinted and favourably received in England.

From "Redwood."

THE OPINIONS OF A YANKEE SPINSTER.

"Well," said Debby, "contentment is a good thing and a rare; but I guess it dwells most where people would least expect to find it. There's Ellen Bruce, she has had troubles that would fret some people to death, and yet I have seldom seen her with a cloudy face."

"How do you account for that, Miss Debby? I am curious to get at this secret of happiness, for I have been in great straits sometimes for the want of it."

"Why, I'll tell you. Now, Ellen, I do n't mean to praise you"—and she looked at Ellen while an expression of affection spread over her rough-featured face. "The truth is, Ellen has been so busy about making other people happy, that she has no time to think of herself; instead of grieving about her own troubles, she has tried to lessen other people's; instead of talking about her own feelings and thinking about them, you would not know she had any, if you did not see she always knew just how other people felt."

"Stop, stop, Deborah, my good friend;" said Ellen, "you must not turn flatterer in your old age."

"Flatterer! The Lord have mercy on you, girl; nothing was farther from my thoughts than flattering. I meant just to tell this young lady for her information, that the secret of happiness was to forget yourself and care for the happiness of others."

"You are right—I believe you are right," said Miss Campbell, with animation; "though I have practised very little after your golden rule."

"The more's the pity, young woman; for depend on it, it's the safe rule and the sure; I have scriptur' warrant for it, beside my own observation; which, as you may judge, has not been small. It's a strange thing, this happiness; it puts me in mind of an old Indian I have heard of, who said to a boy who was begging him for a bow and arrow, 'the more you say bow and arrow, the more I won't make it.' There's poor Mr. Redwood; as far as I can find out, he has had nothing all his life to do but to go up and down and to and fro upon the earth, in search of happiness; look at his face: it is as sorrowful as a tombstone, and just makes you ponder upon what has been, and what might have been; and his kickshaw of a daughter—why I, Debby Lennox, a lone old woman that I am, would not change places with her—would not give up my peaceable feelings for hers, for all the gold in the king's coffers: and for the most part, since I have taken a peep into what's called the world, I have seen little to envy among the great and the gay, the rich and handsome."

"And yet, Miss Debby," said Grace, "the world looks upon these as the privileged classes."

"Ah! the world is foolish and stupid besides."

"Well, Miss Deborah, I have unbounded confidence in your wisdom, but since my lot is cast in this same evil world, I should be sorry to think there was no good in it."

"No good, Miss! that was what I did not expect would not say. There is good in everything and everywhere, if we have but eyes to see it and hearts to confess it. There is some pure gold mixed with all this glitter; some here that seem to have as pure hearts and just minds as if they had never stood in the dazzling sunshine of fortune."

"You mean to say, Deborah," said Ellen, "that contentment is a modest, prudent spirit; and that for the most part she avoids the high places of the earth, where the sun burns and the tempests beat, and leads her favourites along quiet vales and to sequestered fountains."

"Just what I would have said, Ellen, though it may not be just as I should have said it;" replied Deborah, smiling. "You young folks like to dress off everything with garlands, while such a plain old body as I only thinks of the substantials"

THE TRAINING OF A BELLE.

Mrs. Manning's notions of education were not peculiar. In her view, the few accomplishments quite indispensable to a young lady, were dancing, music, and French. To attain them she used all the arts of persuasion and bribery; she procured a French governess, who was a monument of patience; she employed a succession of teachers, that much-enduring order, who bore with all long-suffering, the young lady's indolence, caprices, and tyranny. At the age of seven, the grandmother's vanity no longer brooking delay, the child was produced at balls and routes, where her singular beauty attracted every eye, and her dexterous, graceful management of her little person, already disciplined to the rules of Vestris, called forth loud applauses. The child and grandmother were alike bewildered with the incense that was offered to the infant belle and future heiress; and alike unconscious of the sidelong looks of contempt and whispered sneers which their pride and folly provoked. At the age of fourteen Miss Redwood, according to the universal phrase to express the debüt of a young lady, was "brought out;" that is, entered the lists as a candidate for the admiration of fashion and the pretensions of lovers. At eighteen,—the period which has been selected to introduce her to our readers,—she was the idol of the fashionable world, and as completely mistress of all its arts and mysteries as a veteran belle of five-and-twenty.

THOUGHTS OF A DYING MOTHER.

She knows not—no one knows—how to look upon the troubled and vanishing dream of this life, till the light of another falls upon it. No one knows how mean every thing that is transient and perishable appears unto me; how insignificant the joys, nay, even the sufferings that are past, as I stand trembling on the verge of that bright world of innocence and safety, where I hope to appear with the child God has given me.

TRUE POLITENESS.

He who should embody and manifest the virtues taught in Christ's sermon on the Mount, would, though he had never seen a drawing-room, nor even heard of the artificial usages of society, commend himself to all nations, the most refined as well as the most simple.

From "The Poor Rich Man and the Rich Poor Man."

MR. AIKIN'S PHILOSOPHY.

"I must say, I think there is a useless and senseless outcry against rich men. It comes from the ignorant, unobserving, and unreflecting. We must remember that in our country there are no fixed classes: the poor family of this generation is the rich family of the next; and more than that, the poor of to-day are the rich of to-morrow, and the rich of to-day the poor of to-morrow. The prizes are open to all, and they fall without favour. Our rich people, too, are, many of them, among the very best persons in society. I know some such: there is Mr. Beckwith; he has ten talents, and a faithful steward is he; he and his whole family are an honour and blessing to their country; doing in every way all the good they can. Such a rich man as Morris Finley I despise, or rather pity, as much as you or any man can; but pray do not let us envy him his riches; they are something quite independent of himself; and can a man be really poorer than he is—a poor mind, a poor heart—that is the poverty to shun. As to rich men being at their ease, Miner, every acquisition brings a new want—a new responsibility."

"But, Aikin Aikin; now, candidly, would you not be willing to take their wants and responsibilities with their purses?"

"I cannot say, Miner; money is the representative of power—the means of extended usefulness, and we all have dreams of the wonderful good we should do if we had these means in our hands. But this I do know; that, till we are conscious of employing, and employing well, the means we have, we ought not to crave more. But let us look at the matter in the right point of view. We are all children of one family; all are to live here a few years; some in one station, and some in another. We are all of us, from the highest to the lowest, labourers in our Father's field; and as we sow, so shall we reap. If we labour rightly, those words of truth and immense import will sound in our ears like a promise, and not like a threat. We shall work at our posts like faithful children, not like tasked slaves; and shall be sure of the riches that perish not in the using. As to all other riches, is not worth our while to covet or envy them, except in some rare cases, we have all, in this country, gifts and means enough."

THE POOR RICH MAN'S BLESSINGS.

I had a good education. I do not mean as to learning; that is only one part of it; I was taught to use my faculties. But, first and best of all, I early learned to seek the favour of God and the approval of conscience. I have always had a cheerful home, a clean room to come to, clean children, and a nice wife. Your mother has performed her duties, great and small: as to the small, she never has failed a day since we were married to put on her l'other gown at evening, and a clean cap with a riband bow, most always of blue, the colour she knows I like best. Her trade has helped us through many a hard-rubbing day; and it has given me peace of mind; for I know if I were taken from you, she could and would support you without running to any widows' societies or assistant societies.

HIS ADVICE TO HIS CHILDREN.

Observe for yourselves, my children; and don't trust to what others tell you. If you make good use of your bodily eyes and the eyes of your mind, you will see that Providence has bound the rich and the poor by one chain. Their interests are the same; the prosperity of one is the prosperity of all. The fountains are with the rich, but they are no better than a stagnant pool till they flow in streams to the labouring people. The enterprise and success of the merchant give us employment and rich rewards for our labour. We are dependent on them, but they are quite as dependent on us. If there were none of these hateful rich people, who, think you, would build hospitals and provide asylums for orphans, and for the deaf and dumb, and the blind?

HIS REMARKS ON MANNERS.

Manners, for the most part, are only the signs of qualities. If a child has a kind and gentle disposition, he will have the outward sign; if he have the principle that teaches him to maintain his own rights and not encroach on those of others, he will have dignity and deference; which I take to be qualities of the best manners. As to forms of expression, they are easily taught: this I call women's work. They are naturally more mannerly than we."

"You say, Harry," interposed Mrs. Aikin, "that it is women's work to teach manners to the children; but don't you think they learn them mostly from example?"

"Certainly I do; manners, as well as every thing else. Man is called an imitative animal. You can tell by the actions of a child a year old what sort of people it has lived with. If parents are civil and kind to one another, if children never hear from them profane or coarse language, they will as naturally grow up well-behaved, as that candle took the form of the mould it was run in."

SHELLEY, MARY WOLSTONECRAFT,

DAUGHTER of William Godwin and Mary Wolstonecraft, was born in London, August, 1797. Her mother dying at her birth, the daughter was tenderly and carefully brought up by her father and stepmother. The little girl soon evinced traits of the hereditary genius which was afterwards so fully developed.

In the introduction to one of her novels, she herself says of her youth:

"It is not singular that, as the daughter of two persons of distinguished literary celebrity, I should very early in life have thought of writing. As a child I scribbled; and my favourite pastime during the hours given me for recreation, was to 'write stories.' Still, I had a dearer pleasure than this, which was the formation of castles in the air; the indulging in waking dreams; the following up trains of thought, which had for their subject the formation of a succession of imaginary incidents. My dreams were at once more fantastic and agreeable than my writings. In the latter I was a close imitator; rather doing as others had done, than putting down the suggestions of my own mind. What I wrote was intended at least for one other eye — my childhood's companion and friend; but my dreams were all my own; I accounted for them to nobody; they were my refuge when annoyed, my dearest pleasure when free. I lived principally in the country as a girl, and passed a considerable time in Scotland. I made occasional visits to the more picturesque parts, but my habitual residence was on the blank and dreary northern shores of the Tay, near Dundee. Blank and dreary on retrospection I call them; they were not so to me then. They were the eyry of freedom, and the pleasant region where unheeded I could commune with the creatures of my fancy. I wrote then, but in a most commonplace style. It was beneath the trees of the grounds belonging to our house, or on the bleak sides of the woodless mountains near, that my true compositions, the airy flights of my imagination, were born and fostered. I did not make myself the heroine of my tales. Life appeared to me too commonplace an affair as regarded myself. I could not figure to myself that romantic woes or wonderful events would ever be my lot; but I was not confined to my own identity, and I could people the hours with creations far more interesting to me at that age than my own sensations."

Here is the key of the true womanly character, disinterestedness. This young girl did not weave the garland or create the Utopia for herself, but for others. The mind of a boy works differently; he places himself in the centre of his creations, and wins the laurel for his own brow.

In 1815 Miss Wolstonecraft was married to Percy Bysshe Shelley, whose name at once moves the admiration, the pity, and the censure of the world. That Mrs. Shelley loved her husband with a truth and devotion seldom exceeded, has been proven by her whole career. Their married life was eminently happy, and the fidelity with which she devoted her fine genius to the elucidation of his writings and the defence of his character, is the best eulogium that has been offered to his memory. Mrs. Shelley thus sketches the first year of her married life and her husband's influence:

"My husband was from the first very anxious that I should prove myself worthy of my parentage, and enrol myself on the page of fame. He was for ever inciting me to obtain literary reputation, which even on my own part I cared for then, though since I have become infinitely indifferent to it. At this time he desired that I should write, not so much with the idea that I could produce any thing worthy of notice, but that he might himself judge how far I possessed the promise of better things hereafter. Still I did nothing. Travelling and the cares of a family occupied my time; and study, in the way of reading or improving my ideas in communication with his far more cultivated mind, was all of literary employment that engaged my attention."

In the summer of 1816, Lord Byron and Mr. and Mrs. Shelley were residing on the banks of the Lake of Geneva. They were in habits of daily intercourse, and when the weather did not allow of their boating excursions on the lake, the Shelleys often passed their evenings with Byron at his house at Diodati. "During a week of rain at this time," says Mr. Moore, "having amused themselves with reading German ghost-stories, they agreed at last to write something in imitation of them. 'You and I,' said Lord Byron to Mrs. Shelley, 'will publish ours together.' He then began his tale of the Vampire; and having the whole arranged in his head, repeated to them a sketch of the story one evening, but from the narrative being in prose, made but little progress in filling up his outline. The most memorable result, indeed, of their story-telling compact, was Mrs. Shelley's wild and powerful romance of 'Frankenstein, or the Modern Prometheus;' one of those original conceptions that take hold of the public mind at once and for ever."

"Frankenstein" was published in 1817, and was instantly recognised as worthy of Godwin's daughter and Shelley's wife, and as, in fact, possessing some of the genius and peculiarities of both. It is formed on the model of St. Leon; but the supernatural power of that romantic visionary produces nothing so striking or awful as the grand conception of "Frankenstein;" the discovery that he can, by his study of natural philosophy, create a living and sentient being. The hero, like Caleb Williams, tells his own story; and the curiosity it excites is equally concentrated and intense. A native of Geneva, Frankenstein, is sent to the University of Ingolstadt to pursue his studies. He had previously dabbled in the occult sciences, and the University afforded vastly extended facilities for prosecuting his abstruse researches. He pores over books on physiology, makes chemical experiments, visits even the receptacles of the dead and the dissecting-room of the anatomist; and after days and nights of incredible labour and fatigue, his perseverance is rewarded—he succeeds in discovering the cause of generation and life; nay, more; he became capable of bestowing animation on lifeless matter! Full of his extraordinary discovery, he proceeds to create a man; and at length, after innumerable trials and revolting experiments to seize and infuse the principle of life into his image of clay, he constructs and animates a gigantic figure eight feet in height. His feelings on completing the creation of this monster are powerfully described, but not so vividly as Mrs. Shelley has depicted her own emotions when the plot of the story was first seized or comprehended by her imagination.

In 1817 Shelley and his wife returned to England and spent several months in Buckinghamshire. In 1818 they returned to Italy; their eldest child died in Rome; the parents then retired to Leghorn for a few months, and after travelling to various places, finally, in 1820, took up their residence at Pisa. In July, 1821, Shelley's death occurred; he was drowned in the Gulf of Lerici.

Mrs. Shelley had one son who survived his father; with her children she returned to England, and for years supported herself by her writings. In 1844 her son, Henry Florence Shelley, succeeded to the title and estates of his grandfather.

Mrs. Shelley's second work of fiction, "Walpurga," was published in 1823. Her other novels are "Lodore," "Perkin Warbeck," "Falkner," and "The Last Man." She wrote a "Journal of her Travels in Italy and Germany;" also "Lives of Eminent French Poets." But her last work, "Memoirs of Shelley," prefixed to the complete edition of his Poems and Letters, displays her character in its loveliest light. She is the guardian angel of her dead husband's fame, as she was of his happiness while he lived. Mrs. Shelley is a woman of original genius; "like her father, she excels in mental analysis," says Mr. Chambers, commenting on "Frankenstein," "and in the conceptions of the grand and the powerful, but fails in the management of her fable, where probable incidents and familiar life are required or attempted." But in "Lodore" she has shown her power to depict scenes true to nature. Mrs. Shelley died in London, February 1st, 1851, in the fifty-third year of her age.

From "Frankenstein."

THE CREATION OF THE MONSTER.

It was on a dreary night of November that I beheld the accomplishment of my toils. With an anxiety that almost amounted to agony, I collected the instruments of life around me, that I might infuse a spark of being into the lifeless thing that lay at my feet. It was already one in the morning; the rain pattered dismally against the panes, and my candle was nearly burnt out, when, by the glimmer of the half-extinguished light, I saw the dull yellow eye of the creature open; it breathed hard, and a convulsive motion agitated its limbs.

How can I describe my emotions at this catastrophe, or how delineate the wretch whom with such infinite pains and care I had endeavoured to form? His limbs were in proportion, and I had selected his features as beautiful. Beautiful! Great God! His yellow skin scarcely covered the working of muscles and arteries beneath; his hair was of a lustrous black, and flowing; his teeth of pearly whiteness; but these luxuriances only formed a more horrid contrast with his watery eyes, that seemed almost of the same colour as the dun-white sockets in which they were set, his shrivelled complexion, and straight, black lips.

LOVE.

It is said that in love we idolize the object, and placing him apart and selecting him from his fellows, look on him as superior in nature to all others. We do so; but even as we idolize the object of our affections, do we idolize ourselves: if we separate him from his fellow mortals, so do we separate ourselves; and glorying in belonging to him alone, feel lifted above all other sensations, all other joys and griefs, to one hallowed circle from which all but his idea is banished. We walk as if a mist or some more potent charm divided us from all but him; a sanctified victim, which none but the priest set apart for that office could touch and not pollute, enshrined in a cloud of glory, made glorious through beauties not our own.

SHERWOOD, MRS.,

Has written many books, and always with a worthy purpose. In the character of the Lady of the Manor she has, perhaps unconsciously, given us the key to her own. Like that good lady, Mrs. Sherwood resides in the south of England; she is the widow of an English officer, and passed several years with her husband in India. Since his decease, which occurred when she was in the prime of life, Mrs. Sherwood has found her chief occupations and pleasures in her own home, instructing her children and writing works to assist in the Christian instruction of the young. The titles of her books show for whom they were prepared. "Little Henry and his Bearer" was her first literary production. Then followed "The History of John Martin," "The Fairchild Family," "The Infant's Progress," "The Indian Pilgrim," "Victoria Anzoomund," "A Birthday Present," "Errand Boy," "The Young Foresters," "Juliana Oakley,"

"Erminia," "Emancipation," and a number of other stories. Her largest and most important work, however, is "The Lady of the Manor," in four volumes. Its design is to teach the doctrines of the Church of England to young females. The religious novel has always appeared to us an amusement of doubtful utility. That Christian morals should be inculcated in every work of fiction sent forth in a Christian land, is imperative. From the fact that the Saviour taught these principles by his parables, we are constrained to believe that much good may be done by showing portraiture of the struggles of virtue, the sacrifices of self, and the triumphs of integrity over the evils which curse the world. But the doctrines of religion should, we think, be learned from the Bible and from those appointed to expound its teachings; the discipline of the Church, its forms and rules, are best remembered when studied in their shortest and simplest arrangement; still, the advice communicated in the didactic portions of Mrs. Sherwood's "Lady of the Manor" is, for the most part, excellent, and has, we doubt not, done great good. She is entitled to our warmest esteem as a woman of sincere piety, who has laboured long and earnestly in the highest and holiest cause that can occupy a female pen—the advancement of Christ's kingdom on earth. In her literary claims Mrs. Sherwood is excelled by many living writers of her own sex; as a Christian, we fear few could be found worthy to rank as her equal. Her works have been widely circulated in America.

SIGOURNEY, LYDIA HUNTLEY,

Was born in Norwich, Connecticut, in the year 1791. She was the only child of her parents, and consequently was brought up with great tenderness. Her parentage was in that happy mediocrity which requires industry, yet encourages hope; and the habits of order and diligence in which she was carefully trained by her judicious mother have no doubt been of inestimable advantage to the intellectual character of the daughter.

She early exhibited indications of genius. Perhaps the loneliness of her lot, without brother or sister to share in the usual sports of childhood had an influence on her pursuits and pleasures. We are by no means in favour of establishing precocity of intellect as the standard of real genius. Still, it is true that many distinguished persons have been marked in childhood as extraordinary; the opening blossom has given forth the sweet odour which the rich fruit, like that of the Mangostan, embodies in its delicious perfection. At eight years of age the little Lydia was a scribbler of rhymes; like Pope, "lipping in numbers." Her first work was published in 1815. It was a small volume, entitled "Miscellaneous Pieces in Prose and Verse." Before this, however, she had fortunately met with a judicious and most generous patron. To Daniel Wadsworth, Esq., of Hartford, belongs the tribute of praise which is due for drawing such a mind from the obscurity where it had remained "afar from the untasted sunbeam."

In 1819 Miss Huntley was united in marriage with Charles Sigourney, a respectable merchant of Hartford, Connecticut; a gentleman of cultivated taste and good literary attainments. From that period Mrs. Sigourney devoted her leisure to literary pursuits; she has produced a variety of works, each and all having one general design—that of doing good.

In 1822 she published "Traits of the Aborigines of America;" a descriptive and historical poem in five cantos. It depicts with truth, and often with much vigour, the condition of the red man before the arrival of his European conqueror, and has passages of deep tenderness and wild beauty. Yet, written as it is in blank verse, and rather discursively, the impression it leaves on the mind is not powerful.

Mrs. Sigourney's next work was in prose—"A Sketch of Connecticut Forty Years Since," published in 1824. During the ensuing fourteen years she sent forth "Poetry for Children," "Sketches; a Collection of Prose Tales, &c.," "Poems," "Zinzendorf," "Letters to Young Ladies," and "Letters to Mothers." All these were favourably received by the American public, and gave the author a warm place in the heart of the people.

In 1840 Mrs. Sigourney went to Europe, visiting England and Scotland in the summer, and passing the winter in Paris, where she received much kindness. She returned to her home in Hartford during the spring of 1841. While on her visit, a volume of her selected poems, superbly illustrated, was published in London, and soon after her return, "Pocahontas," the most carefully finished of her long poems, came out in New York. In 1842 her "Pleasant Memories in Pleasant Lands," a record in prose and verse of her wanderings abroad, was issued; and in 1846 "Myrtis, with other Etchings and Sketching," was published. Since then she has sent out several works, among which are "Water-drops;" an excellent contribution to the temperance cause. A volume of her "Poems," beautifully illustrated, was published in 1848.

The talents and industry of Mrs. Sigourney have won for her a good reputation; and though

British critics have attempted to disparage her genius by accusing her of imitating Mrs. Hemans, yet her works are esteemed by English Christians as the most useful of their class. An American critic has well defined the powers of this truly American poetess;—"Mrs. Sigourney's works express with great purity and evident sincerity the tender affections which are so natural to the female heart, and the lofty aspirations after a higher and better state of being which constitute the truly ennobling and elevating principle in art as well as nature. Love and religion are the unvarying elements of her song; if her powers of expression were equal to the purity and elevation of her habits of thought and feeling, she would be a female Milton or a Christian Pindar. But though she does not inherit

'The force and ample pinion that the Theban eagles bear, Sailing with supreme dominion through the liquid vaults of air,'

she nevertheless manages language with ease and elegance, and often with much of the curiosa felicitas, that 'refined felicity' of expression, which is, after all, the principal charm in poetry. In blank verse she is very successful. The poems that she has written in this measure have not unfrequently much of the manner of Wordsworth, and may be nearly or quite as highly relished by his admirers."

The predominance of hope with devotional feeling has inclined Mrs. Sigourney to elegiac poetry, in which she excels. Her muse has been a comforter to the mourner. No poet has written such a number of these songs, nor are these of necessity melancholy. Many of hers sound the notes of holy triumph and awaken the brightest anticipations of felicity—ay,

"Teach us of the melody of heaven."

She "leaves not the trophy of death at the tomb," but shows us the "Resurrection and the Life." Thus she elevates the hopes of the Christian and chastens the thoughts of the worldly-minded. This is her mission, the true purpose of her heaven-endowed mind; for the inspirations of genius are from heaven, and, when not perverted by a corrupt will, rise upward as naturally as the morning dew on the flower is exhaled to the skies.

We must not omit to record that Mrs. Sigourney is, in private life, an example to her sex, as well as their admiration in her literary career. She is a good wife and devoted mother; and in all domestic knowledge and the scrupulous performance of her household duties, she shows as ready acquaintance and as much skill as though these alone formed her pursuits. Her literary studies are her recreations—surely as rational a mode of occupying the leisure of a lady as the morning call or the evening party.

From "Letters to Mothers."

POWER OF A MOTHER.

You have gained an increase of power. The influence which is most truly valuable is that of mind over mind. How entire and perfect is this dominion over the unformed character of your infant. Write what you will upon the printless tablet with your wand of love. Hitherto your influence over your dearest friend, your most submissive servant, has known bounds and obstructions. Now, you have over a new-born immortal almost that degree of power which the mind exercises over the body, and which Aristotle compares to the "sway of a prince over a bond-man." The period of this influence must indeed pass away; but while it lasts, make good use of it.

Admitting that it is the profession of our sex to teach, we perceive the mother to be first in point of precedence, in degree of power, in the faculty of teaching, and in the department allotted. For in point of precedence she is next to the Creator; in power over her pupil, limitless and without competitor; in faculty of teaching, endowed with the prerogative of a transforming love; while the glorious department allotted is a newly quickened soul and its immortal destiny.

THE MOTHER'S TEACHINGS.

Wise men have said, and the world begins to believe, that it is the province of woman to teach. You, then, as a mother, are advanced to the head of that profession. I congratulate you. You hold that license which authorizes you to teach always. You have attained that degree in the College of Instruction by which your pupils are in your presence continually, receiving lessons whether you intend it or not, and if the voice of precept be silent, fashioning themselves on the model of your example. You cannot escape from their imitation. You cannot prevent them from carrying into another generation the stamp of those habits which they inherit from you. If you are thoughtless or supine, an unborn race will be summoned as witnesses of your neglect.

WOMAN'S PATRIOTISM.

This, then, is the patriotism of woman; not to thunder in senates, or to usurp dominion, or to seek the clarion-blast of fame, but faithfully to teach by precept and example that wisdom, integrity, and peace which are the glory of a nation. Thus, in the wisdom of Providence, has she been prepared by the charm of life's fairest season for the happiness of love; incited to rise above the trifling amusements and selfish pleasures which once engrossed her, that she might be elevated to the maternal dignity; cheered under its sleepless cares by a new affection; girded for its labours by the examples of past ages, and adjured to fidelity in its most sacred duties by the voice of God.

SKETCH OF A FAMILY.

It is the duty of mothers to sustain the reverses of fortune. Frequent and sudden as they have been in our own country, it is important that young females should possess some employment by which they might obtain a livelihood in case they should be reduced to the necessity of supporting themselves. When females are suddenly reduced from affluence to poverty, how pitiful, contemptible it is, to see the mother desponding and helpless, and permitting her daughters to embarrass those whom it is their duty to assist and cheer.

"I have lost my whole fortune," said a merchant, as he returned one evening to his home; "we can no longer keep our carriage. We must leave this large house. The children can no longer go to expensive schools. Yesterday I was a rich man; to-day there is nothing I can call my own."

"Dear husband," said the wife, "we are still rich in each other and our children. Money may pass away, but God has given us a better treasure in these active hands and loving hearts."

"Dear father," said the children, "do not look so sober. We will help you to get a living."

"What can you do, poor things?" said he.

"You shall see! you shall see!" answered several voices. "It is a pity if we have been to school for nothing. How can the father of eight children be poor? We shall work and make you rich again."

"I shall help," said the little girl, hardly four years old. "I shall not have any new things bought, and I shall sell my great doll."

The heart of the husband and father, which had sunk within his bosom like a stone, was lifted up. The sweet enthusiasm of the scene cheered him, and his nightly prayer was like a song of praise.

They left their stately house. The servants were dismissed. Pictures and plate, rich carpets and furniture were sold, and she who had been the mistress of the mansion shed no tears.

"Pay every debt," said she; "let no one suffer through us, and we may be happy."

He rented a neat cottage and a small piece of ground a few miles from the city. With the aid of his sons he cultivated vegetables for the market. He viewed with delight and astonishment the economy of his wife, nurtured as she had been in wealth, and the efficiency which his daughters soon acquired under her training.

The eldest instructed in the household, and also assisted the young children; besides, they executed various works which they had learned as accomplishments, but which they found could be disposed of to advantage. They embroidered with taste some of the ornamental parts of female apparel which were readily sold to a merchant in the city.

They cultivated flowers, sent bouquets to market in the cart that conveyed the vegetables; they plaited straw, they painted maps, they executed plain needle-work. Every one was at her post, busy and cheerful. The little cottage was like a bee-hive.

"I never enjoyed such health before," said the father.

"And I was never so happy before," said the mother.

"We never knew how many things we could do when we lived in the grand house," said the children, "and we love each other a great deal better here. You call us your little bees."

"Yes," replied the father; "and you make just such honey as the heart likes to feed on."

Economy, as well as industry, was strictly observed; nothing was wasted. Nothing unnecessary was purchased. The eldest daughter became assistant teacher in a distinguished seminary, and the second took her place as instructress to the family.

The dwelling, which had always been kept neat, they were soon able to beautify. Its construction was improved, and the vines and flowering trees were replanted around it. The merchant was happier under his woodbine-covered porch in a summer's evening, than he had been in his showy dressing-room.

"We are now thriving and prosperous," said he; "shall we return to the city?"

"Oh, no!" was the unanimous reply.

"Let us remain," said the wife, "where we have found health and contentment."

"Father," said the youngest, "all we children hope you are not going to be rich again; for then," she added, "we little ones were shut up in the nursery, and did not see much of you or mother. Now we all live together, and sister, who loves us, teaches us, and we learn to be industrious and useful. We were none of us happy when we were rich and did not work. So, father, please not to be rich any more."

THE MOTHER OF WASHINGTON.*

Long hast thou slept unnoted. Nature stole
In her soft ministry around thy bed,
Spreading her vernal tissue, violet-gemm'd,
And pearl'd with dew.

She bade bright Summer bring
Gifts of frankincense, with sweet song of birds,
And Autumn cast his reaper's coronet
Down at thy feet, and stornly Winter speak
Sternly of man's neglect. But now we come
To do thee homage, mother of our chief!
Fit homage—such as honoureth him who pays.

Methinks we see thee; as in olden time,
Simple in garb—majestic and serene,
Unmoved by pomp or circumstance—in truth
Inflexible, and with a Spartan zeal
Repressing vice and making folly grave.
Thou didst not deem it woman's part to waste
Life in inglorious sloth—to sport a while
Amid the flowers, or on the summer wave,
Then fleet, like the ephemeron, away,
Building no temple in her children's hearts,
Save to the vanity and pride of life
Which she had worshipp'd.

For the might that clothed
The "Pater Patrie"—for the glorious deeds
That make Mount Vernon's tomb a Mecca shrine
For all the earth—what thanks to thee are due,
Who, 'mid his elements of being, wrought,
We know not—Heaven can tell!

Rise, sculptured pile!
And show a race unborn who rest below,
And say to mothers what a holy charge
Is theirs—with what a kingly power their love
Might rule the fountains of the newborn mind.
Warn them to wake at early dawn, and sow
Good seed before the World hath sown her tares;
Nor in their toil decline—that angel hands
May put the sickle in, and reap for God,
And gather to his garner. Ye, who stand
With thrilling breast to view her trophied praise,
Who nobly rear'd Virginia's godlike chief—
Ye, whose last thought upon your nightly couch,

* On laying the corner-stone of her monument at Fredericksburg, Virginia.

Whose first at waking, is your cradled son,
 What though no high ambition prompts to rear
 A second Washington, or leave your name
 Wrought out in marble with a nation's tears
 Of deathless gratitude—yet may you raise
 A monument above the stars—a soul
 Led by your teachings and your prayers to God.

PRAYER FOR MISSIONS.

Night wraps the realm where Jesus woke,
 No guiding star the magi see,
 And heavy hangs oppression's yoke,
 Where first the Gospel said "be free."

And where the harps of angels bore
 High message to the shepherd-through,
 "Good will and peace" are heard no more
 To murmur Bethlehem's vales along.

Swarth India, with her idol-train,
 Bends low by Ganges' worshipp'd tide,
 Or drowns the suttee's shrink of pain
 With thundering gong and pagan pride

On Persia's hills the Sophi grope;
 Dark Birmah greets salvation's ray;
 Even jealous China's door of hope
 Unbars to give the Gospel way

Old Ocean, with his isles, awakes,
 Cold Greenland feels unwonted flame,
 And humble Afric wondering takes
 On her sad lips a Saviour's name.

Their steps the forest-children stay,
 Bound to oblivion's voiceless shore,
 And lift their red brows to the day,
 Which from the opening skies doth pour.

Then aid with prayer that holy light
 Which from eternal death can save,
 And bid Christ's heralds speed their flight,
 Ere millions find a hopeless grave.

A BUTTERFLY ON A CHILD'S GRAVE.

A butterfly bask'd on a baby's grave,
 Where a lily had chanced to grow:
 "Why art thou here, with thy gaudy dye,
 When she of the blue and sparkling eye
 Must sleep in the churchyard low?"

Then it lightly soar'd through the sunny air,
 And spoke from its shining track:
 "I was a worm till I won my wings,
 And she whom thou mourn'st, like a seraph sings:
 Wouldst thou call the blest one back?"

THE ALPINE FLOWERS.

Meek dwellers 'mid yon terror-stricken cliffs!
 With brows so pure, and incense-breathing lips,
 Whence are ye? Did some white-wing'd messenger
 On Mercy's mission trust your timid germ
 To the cold cradle of eternal snows?
 Or, breathing on the callous icicles,
 Bid them with tear-drops nurse ye?—

—Tree nor shrub

Dare that drear atmosphere; no polar pine
 Uprears a veteran front; yet there ye stand,
 Leaning your cheeks against the thick-ribb'd ice,
 And looking up with brilliant eyes to Him
 Who bids you bloom unblanch'd amid the waste
 Of desolation. Man, who panting, toils
 O'er slippery steeps, or, trembling, treads the verge
 Of yawning gulfs, o'er which the headlong plunge
 Is to eternity, looks shuddering up,
 And marks ye in your placid loveliness—
 Fearless, yet frail—and, clasping his chill hands,
 Blesses your pencil'd beauty. 'Mid the pomp
 Of mountain summits rushing on the sky,
 And chaining the rapt soul in breathless awe,
 He bows to bind you drooping to his breast,
 Inhales your spirit from the frost-wing'd gale,
 And freer dreams of heaven.

THE THRIVING FAMILY.

A SONG.

Our father lives in Washington,
 And has a world of cares,
 But gives his children each a farm,
 Enough for them and theirs.
 Full thirty well-grown sons has he,
 A numerous race indeed,
 Married and settled all, d'ye see,
 With boys and girls to feed.
 So, if we wisely till our lands,
 We're sure to earn a living,
 And have a penny too to spare
 For spending or for giving.
 A thriving family are we,
 No lordling need deride us;
 For we know how to use our hands.
 And in our wits we pride us.
 Hail brothers, hail!
 Let nought on earth divide us.

Some of us dare the sharp north-east,
 Some clover-fields are mowing;
 And others tend the cotton-plants
 That keep the looms a-going;
 Some build and steer the white-wing'd ships,
 And few in speed can mate them;
 While others rear the corn and wheat,
 Or grind the corn to freight them.
 And if our neighbours o'er the sea
 Have e'er an empty larder,
 To send a loaf their babes to cheer
 We'll work a little harder.
 No old nobility have we,
 No tyrant king to ride us;
 Our sages in the capitol
 Enact the laws that guide us.
 Hail, brothers, hail!
 Let nought on earth divide us.

Some faults we have, we can't deny,
 A foible here and there;
 But other households have the same,
 And so we won't despair.
 'T will do no good to fume and frown,
 And call hard names, you see,
 And what a shame 't would be to part
 So fine a family!
 'T is but a waste of time to fret,
 Since Nature made us one,
 For every quarrel cuts a thread
 That healthful Love has spun.
 Then draw the cords of union fast,
 Whatever may betide us,
 And closer cling through every blast,
 For many a storm has tried us.
 Hail, brothers, hail!
 Let nought on earth divide us.

SMITH, ELIZABETH OAKES,

Was born near Portland, Maine. Her maiden name was Prince, and she traces her descent, from both father and mother, to the early Puritans. Her genius began to develop itself very early; even before she could write she used to compose little stories and print them; at the age of eight she was carrying on an extensive correspondence with imaginary persons, and also keeping a journal. Yet, with all this, she was a very lively and playful child, possessing a large family of at least a dozen dolls, and also showing herself a very expert little needle-woman. Her religious feelings were early excited to action, and, when a mere child, she would pass most of the night in prayer for herself or some of her relations who happened to sin against her code of morals; and occasionally she would discipline herself still farther—would fast, or inflict some bodily torture on herself — sometimes to such an extent that a fainting-fit would reveal her sufferings to her family.

At the age of sixteen Miss Prince married Seba Smith, Esq., a lawyer and an accomplished scholar, at that time editor of the Portland Advertiser, but who is more widely known as the original Jack Downing. In 1839 Mr. Smith removed to New York, and Mrs. Smith, who had written for publication anonymously, commenced then to write under her own name; sacrificing for the sake of her children those feelings of feminine sensitiveness and delicacy which had made her before shrink from publicity. She resides now at Brooklyn, Long Island, which has been her home for a number of years.

Mrs. Smith's writings consist chiefly of Poems, Essays, Tales, and Criticisms, which have appeared in the different annuals and periodicals of the day. Her first published book was entitled "Riches without Wings;" written for the young, but interesting to readers of all ages. In 1842 she published a novel, "The Western Captive," founded on traditions of Indian life. In 1844 "The Sinless Child, and other Poems" appeared, which were very favourably received, and have passed through several editions. Subsequently she wrote a tragedy called "The Roman Tribute," founded upon an incident in Roman history, when the emperor saves Constantinople from pillage by paying its price to Attila, the victorious Hun. Her next work was also a tragedy, entitled, "Jacob Leisler," and founded upon the insurrection in New York in 1680. In 1848 Mrs. Smith published a prose work, called "The Salamander; or a Legend for Christmas, by Ernest Helfenstein." She has, moreover, written numerous tales and poems for children, and edited "The May Flower," "Tribute to the Beautiful," and "Miller's Poetry of Flowers."

In 1850 her play of "The Roman Tribute" was brought out in Philadelphia and acted with some access. However, it did not meet the favour it deserved; its general tone and the sentiments expressed in it being too lofty and elevated to please the popular mind. It is, like many plays written by persons of genius, better adapted perhaps to the closet than the stage in its present state. Her tragedies have not been published.

Mrs. Smith holds, deservedly, a high rank among the writers of America. Her metaphysical and thoughtful turn of mind may prevent her from being as widely popular as some of much less natural genius and power, but will only make her more warmly admired and loved by those who study her writings with the attention they deserve. The pure and lofty morality of her productions will always command admiration, and some of her sonnets and shorter poems are almost unequalled for their finish and play of fancy. Her conversational talents are remarkable, and those who have the privilege of her acquaintance are both charmed and instructed; her bright fancies blending with her benevolence give her words a peculiar power over the listener.

From "Miscellaneous Papers."

DREAMS OF CHILDHOOD.

I used to dream of joyous shapes floating in the air which were angels to me. I must have started very early in life the heresy that angels have no wings, because these creatures had none in my sleep. These did not speak to me, but looked lovingly upon me; and I would clasp my hands with such fervency of desire to be worthy of their companionship that I often awoke in tears. I grew shy when others talked of dreams, lest I should be called upon to describe my world of visions, which then I felt would be a desecration. I am confident one reason why children dread being alone in the dark is owing to the huge shapes and vague impressions of similar scenes brought to the mind in the process of dreaming. It is cruel to compel them to darkness when this is the case. I have no doubt many a child might trace the morbid action of his faculties to an undue severity upon this ground. "Truly the light is good, and a pleasant thing it is to behold the sun." For myself, I needed no indulgence on this score.

WAKING DREAMS.

I was a courageous child, delighting in the mystical and confidently expecting some revelation — longing to have a voice call on me as did the child Samuel — bending my ear to listen, and ready to say "speak, Lord!" As life wore on and the revelation of an actual presence was withheld, I redoubled my little fasts, and was more earnest in my prayers that I might be accounted worthy; I inflicted childish penances upon myself all to no purpose. Dreams of rare significancy I had, indeed, and day-dreams of grandeur and beauty too deep for utterance; poetry in its manifold forms came to my mind's eye, but unearthly shapes and strange voices were not vouchsafed.

From "The Beloved of the Evening Star."

LOVE.

Strange, that an emotion of such universal import as love should be treated with so little reverence by the constitution of society; that a sentiment involving so much of human happiness or misery, affecting health, intellect, and life itself, should be the subject for gibes and jokes, instead of being met, as it should be, with solemn and holy thought, and deep, earnest reverence, as of a mystery belonging to the soul itself, and not to be profaned. Laws are made not to guard the sacredness of this necessity of our being, but to guard inviolate the sacredness of contract. "This ought ye to do, and not to leave the other undone." We all weep over the wrongs and sorrows of loving hearts; history, literature, the dweller of the palace, and the peasant beside the "stile;" each and all are alive to the same sentiment and suffer the same griefs, yet no man has said to his neighbour, "Come, let us see if we cannot do something to right this great human wrong; let us see to it, that the congenial stand only in relation, and thus do away the greatest temptation to evil in the minds of the weak and erring."

RELIGION.

We are fast casting aside the crude shackles of superstition, and God only knows how much of the best part of religion is going also—its simpleness of faith, its earnest and affectionate hold of the heart, which clings to it with the tenacity of the Patriarch, when he said, "I will not let thee go except thou bless me." The cold, intellectual assent of the understanding, however high in the abstract, is poor in comparison with that life-giving grasp which, though dimmed by excess of faith, is yet the grasp of one who feels a great and overwhelming human need.

Surely it is not well to make our religion, as the tendency of the age is, a matter for logical deduction—a subject for seventh-day speculation, when it should be a daily and hourly craving of the heart; a going forth of the spirit to commune with spirit; a beautiful lifting of the veil of the temple to behold the mystery and glory within. The instinctive faith of the child-man is better than this; who "sees God in clouds and hears him in the wind," and who, in the dimness of his reverence, gropes amid omens and dreams, in the blind fear of slighting the intimations of that all-pervading power which he "ignorantly worships."

From "Woman and her Needs."

It appears to me we need less of legislation in regard to our sex than that of enlightened public opinion. Whether we wear this or that costume, or go to the polls or stay away, seems of less importance than a radical understanding of our true selves. Let us assert first the reverence due us as a portion of the moral and intellectual type, and gradually we shall take that symmetrical position in human affairs which is for the best good of the world—certainly, we shall have other and better influence than we now have.

I am aware that the large class of the other sex, enraptured with the sensualities of Moore, and fit only to admire "bread and butter girls," will oppose this theory of marriage. It is the style to prate of "sweet sixteen," and to talk of the loveliness of girlhood; and most lovely is it, and sacred should it be held: and therefore the woman should not be defrauded of the period; she should not be allowed to step from the baby-house to the marriage altar. It should be considered not only unwise to do so, but absolutely indelicate. It should affix odium to parents and guardians, if done by their instrumentality, or if by the will of the girl, be regarded as an evidence of precocious development, as unchaste as it is unwise.

FEMALE PHYSICIANS.

Eudocia. Our art is learn'd by dames of gent'le blood
Who sit with patient toil and lips contract,
If so they may relieve one human pang.
The ghastly wound appals us not, nor yet
The raging fury of the moonstruck brain;
Not wrinkled hags are we, with corded veins,
Croaking with spells the midnight watches through
But some are fair as she, the vestal mother.

THE WRONGED MOTHER AND HER SON

Boy, thou wilt be a man anon, and learn
Hard, cruel, manlike ways: thou wilt break hearts,
And think it brave pastime; thou wilt rule men,
And for the pleasure of thy petty will
Make pools of blood, and top thy pikes with heads;
Burn cities, and condemn the little ones
To bleed and die within their mother's arms!
Child. [weeping.] I will never be so vile; I will be brave
And merciful as thou hast taught me.

Eud. [fondly.] Wilt thou, pretty dear? Thou art a brave boy.

Wilt always love me? Look here into mine eyes—
My own brave boy, when men shall evil speak,
Defame and curse me, wilt thou forget to love?

Child. Never!

Eud. Never, my brave boy; and when evil tongues
Shall make thy mother's name a blush, wilt thou,
Mine own dear child, wilt thou believe?

Child. Never!

Eud. My boy, dost thou remember thy poor dove,
Thy white-wing'd dove, which the fell hawk pursued,
And sprinkled all the marble with his blood?

Child. [sobbing.] My poor, dear dove!

Eud. Ay, thine innocent dove!
Listen, child! In the long hereafter years,
Wilt thou remember me as that poor dove,
Hawk'd down and done to death by cruel hands?
Think this, and God himself will bless thee!

From "Poems."

THE CHILD SPIRIT.

She is thy guardian angel—she,
From out the crystal gates
Lured by her tenderness for thee,
Upon thy pathway waits.

With rosy fingers, golden hair,
Thy couch she lingers near,
To smooth the brow oppress'd by care,
And dry the earth-born tear.

Thy spirit walks with her along
The peopled home of space,
Where thought is always breathed in song,
And love lights every face.

Oh, wildering hours of heart-felt bliss,
As hand in hand ye glide,
Forgetful of a world like this,
And all its grief beside.

Thy fingers by her own impress'd,
The lingering touch retain,
When morning from the dewy east
Recalls thy sense again.

Her murmur'd accents in thine ear,
 Thrill in thy deepest heart —
 Alas! that voices, loved and dear,
 Should with our sleep depart.

We hear them in the midnight hours
 Call softly through the gloom,
 And know they walk in heavenly bowers —
 Their ashes in the tomb.

Walk, where fair valleys wake to sight,
 And crystal waters leap —
 Or gather, radiant with delight,
 Around us in our sleep.

And these are they who never more
 Our coarser senses greet,
 But loving as they did of yore,
 Our spirit-vision meet.

She, all unseen, precedes thy path,
 To see what peril waits,
 And turns aside the impending wrath
 Of thy opposing fates.

She may not know how deep the wrong,
 How dread the ill may be,
 But, with a love than death more strong,
 Her wing doth shelter thee.

THE RECALL, OR SOUL MELODY.

Nor dulcimer nor harp shall breathe
 Their melody for me;
 Within my secret soul be wrought
 A holier minstrelsy!
 Descend into thy depths, oh soul!
 And every sense in me control.

Thou hast no voice for outward mirth,
 Whose purer strains arise
 From those that steal from crystal gates
 The hymnings of the skies;
 And well may earth's cold jarrings cease,
 When such have soothed thee unto peace.

Within thy secret chamber rest,
 And back each sense recall
 That seeketh 'mid the tranquil stars
 Where melody shall fall;
 Call home the wanderer from the vale,
 From mountain and the moonlight pale.

Within the leafy wood the sound
 Of dropping rain may ring,
 Which, rolling from the trembling leaf,
 Falls on the sparrow's wing;
 And music round the waking flower
 May breathe in every star-lit bower:

Yet, come away! nor stay to hear
 The breathings of a voice
 Whose subtle tones awake a thrill
 To make thee to rejoice,
 And vibrate on the listening ear
 Too deep, too earnest — ah, too dear.

Yes, come away, and inward turn
 Each thought and every sense;
 For sorrow lingers from without —
 Thou canst not charm it thence,
 But all attuned the soul may be
 Unto a deathless melody.

THE WATER.

How beautiful the water is!
 Didst ever think of it,
 When down it tumbles from the skies,
 As in a merry fit?
 It jostles, ringing as it falls,
 On all that's in its way;
 I hear it dancing on the roof,
 Like some wild thing at play

'Tis rushing now adown the spout,
 And gushing out below.
 Half frantic in its joyousness,
 And wild in eager flow.
 The earth is dried and parch'd with heat,
 And it hath longed to be Released from out the selfish cloud,
 To cool the thirsty tree.

It washes, rather rudely too,
 The flow'ret's simple grace,
 As if to chide the pretty thing
 For dust upon its face:
 It showers the tree till every leaf
 Is free from dust or stain,
 Then waits till leaf and branch are still'd
 And showers them o'er again.

Drop after drop is tinkling down
 To kiss the stirring brook,
 The water dimples from beneath
 With its own joyous look:
 And then the kindred drops embrace,
 And singing on they go,
 To dance beneath the willow tree,
 And glad the vale below.

How beautiful the water is!
 It loves to come at night,
 To make us wonder in the morn
 To find the earth so bright —
 To see a youthful gloss is spread
 On every shrub and tree,
 And flowerets breathing on the air
 Their odours pure and free.

A dainty thing the water is;
 It loves the blossom's cup,
 To nestle 'mid the odours there,
 And fill the petals up;
 It hangs its gems on every leaf,
 Like diamonds in the sun;
 And then the water wins the smile
 The floweret should have won.

How beautiful the water is!
 To me 't is wondrous fair;
 No spot can ever lonely be,
 If water sparkle there;
 It hath a thousand tongues of mirth,
 Of grandeur, or delight,
 And every heart is gladder made
 When water greets the sight.

FAITH.

Beware of doubt — faith is the subtle chain
 Which binds us to the Infinite: the voice
 Of a deep life within, that will remain
 Until we crowd it thence. We may rejoice
 With an exceeding joy, and make our life —
 Ay, this external life — become a part
 Of that which is within, o'erwrought and rife
 With faith, that childlike blessedness of heart.
 The order and the harmony inborn
 With a perpetual hymning crown our way,
 Till callousness, and selfishness, and scorn,
 Shall pass as clouds where scatheless lightnings play
 Cling to thy faith — 't is higher than the thought
 That questions of thy faith — the cold external doubt

RELIGION.

Alone, yet not alone, the heart doth brood
 With a sad fondness o'er its hidden grief;
 Broods with a miser's joy, wherein relief
 Comes with a semblance of its own quaint mood.
 How many hearts this point of life have pass'd!
 And some a train of light behind have cast,
 To show us what hath been and what may be;
 That thus have suffer'd all the wise and good,
 Thus wept and pray'd, thus struggled and were free
 So doth the pilot, trackless through the deep,
 Unswerving, by the stars his reckoning keep.
 He moves a highway not untried before,
 And thence he courage gains, and joy doth reap, Unflinching lays his course, and leaves behind the shore.

THE WIFE.

All day, like some sweet bird, content to sing
 In its small cage, she moveth to and fro ;
 And ever and anon will upward spring
 To her sweet lips, fresh from the fount below,
 The murrin'd melody of pleasant thought,
 Unconscious uttered, gentle-toned and low.
 Light household duties, evermore inwrought
 With placid fancies of one trusting heart
 That lives but in her smile, and ever turns
 From life's cold seeming and the busy mart,
 With tenderness, that heavenward ever yearns,
 To be refresh'd where one pure altar burns.
 Shut out from hence, the mockery of life.
 Thus liveth she content—the meek, fond, trusting wife.

THE GRIEF-CHILD.

Two stood before an Altar! in a land
 Made up of shadowy dreams and many tears,
 Emotions numbering ages, not fleet years—
 And there, in old Cathedral, hand in hand,
 Amid the pealing anthems of a band
 Of unseen chanter, which the spirit hears,
 Each with a burden'd breast the altar nears.
 Gleams of commingled angels round them stand,
 As each for the baptismal water bears
 A Grief-Child, pale, and hush'd, and wondrously sweet,
 Long nursed in secret, now to God resign'd :
 All self-renounced, they kneel with holy prayers,
 And lay the fair Grief-Child at Jesus' feet ;
 Then to their earth-task wend with willing mind.

SOMERVILLE, MARY,

THE most learned lady of the age, distinguished alike for great scientific knowledge and all womanly virtues; she may well be esteemed an honour to England, her native country, and the glory of her sex throughout the world. We are told that her peculiar genius for mathematical and philosophical studies was early developed, and her natural taste directing her literary pursuits was not thwarted, but kindly encouraged by her friends. We see the happy result of these influences in the harmonious development of her mind and heart. Mrs. Somerville as daughter, wife, and mother, has been a pattern of feminine gentleness, fidelity, and carefulness. The leisure which women too often waste on trifles because they are taught and encouraged through the influence of men thus to waste it, she has improved for good: the result is such as should make Christians in earnest to promote the intellectual cultivation of woman's mind.

The first work of Mrs. Somerville was undertaken by the counsel and encouragement of Lord Brougham. This was a summary of "The Mechanique Celeste" of Laplace, which she prepared for the Library of Useful Knowledge, under the title of "Mechanism of the Heavens." The work was found too voluminous for the society's publications, and therefore it was issued separately in 1831. It is a volume of over 600 pages, large octavo. Its merits were acknowledged at once, and her reputation as an accomplished scientific writer established. It is said that soon after this book appeared its author met Laplace in Paris; during their conversation upon scientific subjects he remarked to her that she was the only person he knew of who seemed to take the trouble to understand his "Mechanique Celeste," except an English lady, who had translated it. Mrs. Somerville must have been gratified to witness his pleasure when learning that she was the lady translator.

Mrs. Somerville's genius was highly appreciated by the Duchess of Kent and the Princess Victoria; and to the latter, when Queen of Great Britain, the second work of this illustrious author is inscribed. The dedication marks the admirable good sense and noble views of both. The work was "The Connexion of the Physical Sciences," published in 1834: of this the Quarterly Review observes; "To the 'Mechanism of the Heavens' succeeded her volume on the 'Connexion of Physical Sciences';" unassuming in form and pretensions, but so original in design and perfect in execution as well to merit the success of eight editions, each carefully embodying all of augmentation that science had intermediately received. Though rich in works on particular sciences, and richer still in those eminent discoveries which establish the relations amongst them, yet had we not before in English a book professing to expound these connexions, which form the greatest attainment of present science and the most assured augury of higher knowledge beyond. Mrs. Somerville held this conception steadily before her, and admirably fulfilled it. Her work, indeed, though small in size, is a true Kosmos in the nature of its design, and in the multitude of materials collected and condensed into the history it affords of the physical phenomena of the universe. In some respects her scheme of treating these topics so far resembles that since adopted by Humboldt, that we may give Mrs. Somerville credit for partial priority of design, while believing that she would be the last person to assert it for herself."

This original and extraordinary work, which learned masculine critics thus allow to exceed any thing of the kind at that time extant, Mrs. Somerville claims only to have devised for the especial benefit of her own sex. She says—addressing the Queen—"If I have succeeded in my endeavour to make the laws by which the material world is governed more familiar to my countrywomen, I shall have the gratification of thinking that the gracious permission to dedicate my book to your majesty has not been misplaced." We know of nothing which more charmingly illustrates the true moral elevation of feminine character than this dedication. The Sovereign Lady and the Lady Author sympathising together in an earnest effort to promote the mental cultivation of their sex. Mrs. Somerville's third and last production, "Physical Geography," in two volumes, was published in 1848. This work—"the history of the earth in its whole material organization," is worthy to be classed among the greatest efforts of the human mind, directing its energies to the philosophy of science conjoined with moral advancement. In truth, its excellence in this department is unrivalled; proving the correctness of the Reviewer's* remark that "it is a fortunate thing for any country that a portion of its literature should fall into the hands of the female sex; because their influence in every walk of letters is almost sure to be powerful and good." Mrs. Somerville has done more by her writings to Christianize the Sciences than any living author; nor do we recollect one, except it be Sir Isaac Newton, among departed philosophers, who has approached her standard of sublime speculations on the visible creation united with childlike faith in the Divine Creator. Physical science will, henceforth, have a religious power; for, though the mind of man is not sufficiently in harmony with moral goodness to make such an advance as Mrs. Somerville has done, no more than Peter and John could see the angel at the tomb of the Saviour, yet, when they heard from the women that Christ was risen and followed in faith, the revelation of the truth was made clear to the reason of the apostles as it had first been made to the love of the devoted females; thus will philosophers follow the moral guidance of a woman. Mrs. Somerville has received many testimonials of the esteem in which her writings are held. She has been elected member of a number of philosophical societies and academies of science both in England and Germany.

GOD AND HIS WORKS.

The earthquake and the torrent, the august and terrible ministers of Almighty power, have torn the solid earth and opened the seals of the most ancient records of creation, written in indelible characters on "the perpetual hills and the everlasting mountains." There we read of the changes that have brought the rude mass to its present fair state, and of the myriads of beings that have appeared on this mortal stage, have fulfilled their destinies, and have been swept from existence to make way for new races, which, in their turn, have vanished from the scene, till the creation of man completed the glorious work. Who shall define the periods of those mornings and evenings when God saw that his work was good? And who shall declare the time allotted to the human race, when the generation of the most insignificant insect existed for unnumbered ages? Yet man is also to vanish in the ever-changing course of events. The earth is to be burnt up, and the elements to melt with fervent heat—to be again reduced to chaos—possibly to be renovated and adorned for other races of beings. These stupendous changes may be but cycles in those great laws of the universe, where all is variable but the laws themselves and He who ordained them.

VARIETIES OF THE HUMAN RACE.

It is no difficult matter to see how changes may occur in speech, but no circumstance in the natural world is more inexplicable than the diversity of form and colour in the human race. It had already begun in the antediluvian world; for "there were giants in the land in those days." No direct mention is made of colour at that time, unless the mark set upon Cain, "lest any one finding him should kill him," may allude to it. Perhaps, also, it may be inferred that black people dwelt in Ethiopia, or the land of Cush, which means black in the Hebrew tongue. At all events, the differences now existing must have arisen after the flood; consequently all must have originated with Noah, whose wife, or the wives of his sons, may have been different colours, for aught we know.

Many instances have occurred of Albinos and red-haired individuals having been born of black parents, and these have transmitted their peculiarities to their descendants for several generations; but it may be doubted whether pure-blooded white people ever had perfectly black offspring. The varieties are much more likely to have arisen from the effects of climate, food, customs, and civilization upon migratory groups of mankind, and of such a few instances have occurred in historical times, limited, however, to smaller numbers and particular spots; but the great mass of nations had received their distinctive characters at a very early period.

AIR.

It has already been mentioned that oxygen is inhaled with the atmospheric air, and also taken in by the pores in the skin; part of it combines chemically with the carbon of the food, and is expired in the form of carbonic acid gas and water, that chemical action is the cause of vital force and heat in man and animals. The quantity of food must be in exact proportion to the quantity of oxygen inhaled, otherwise disease and loss of strength would follow. Since cold air is incessantly carrying off warmth from the skin, more exercise is requisite in winter than in summer—in cold climates than in warm; consequently, more carbon is necessary in the former than in the latter, in order to maintain the chemical action that generates heat, and to ward off the destructive effects of the oxygen which incessantly strives to consume the body.

* North American Review, Vol. xxvi. p. 403.

FOOD.

Animal food, wine, and spirits, contain many times more carbon than fruit and vegetables; therefore animal food is much more necessary in a cold than in a hot climate. The Esquimaux, who lives by the chase, and eats ten or twelve pounds weight of meat and fat in twenty-four hours, finds it not more than enough to keep up his strength and animal heat, while the indolent inhabitant of Bengal is sufficiently supplied with both by his rice diet. Clothing and warmth make the necessity for exercise and food much less, by diminishing the waste of animal heat. Hunger and cold united soon consume the body, because it loses its power of resisting the action of the oxygen, which consumes part of our substance when food is wanting. Hence, nations inhabiting warm climates have no great merit in being abstemious, nor are those committing an excess who live more freely in the colder countries. The arrangement of Divine wisdom is to be admired as much in this as in all other things; for if man had only been capable of living on vegetable food, he never could have had a permanent residence beyond the latitude where corn ripens. The Esquimaux and all the inhabitants of the very high latitudes of both continents live entirely on fish and animal food.

EDUCATION.

The difference between the effects of manual labour and the efforts of the brain appears in the intellectual countenance of the educated man compared with that of the peasant; though he also is occasionally stamped with nature's own nobility. The most savage people are also the ugliest. Their countenance is deformed by violent unsubdued passions, anxiety, and suffering. Deep sensibility gives a beautiful and varied expression, but every strong emotion is unfavourable to perfect regularity of feature; and of that the ancient Greeks were well aware when they gave that calmness of expression and repose to their unrivalled statues. The refining effects of high culture, and, above all, the Christian religion, by subduing the evil passions and encouraging the good, are more than any thing calculated to improve even the external appearance. The countenance, though perhaps of less regular form, becomes expressive of the amiable and benevolent feelings of the heart—the most captivating and lasting of all beauty.

BENEVOLENCE.

Poetry of the highest stamp has fled before the utilitarian spirit of the age, yet there is as much talent in the world, and imagination too, at the present time, as ever there was at any period, though directed to different objects; but, what is of more importance, there is a constant increase of liberal sentiment and disinterested benevolence. Three of the most beneficial systems of modern times are due to the benevolence of English ladies—the improvement of prison discipline, savings-banks, and banks for lending small sums to the poor.

The success of all has exceeded every expectation at home, and these admirable institutions are now adopted abroad. The importance of popular and agricultural education is becoming an object of attention to the more enlightened governments; and one of the greatest improvements in education is that teachers are now fitted for their duties by being taught the art of teaching. The gentleness with which instruction is conveyed no longer blights the joyous days of youth, but, on the contrary, encourages self-education, which is the most efficient.

* * * * *

Noble and liberal sentiments mark the proceedings of public assemblies, whether in the cause of nations or individuals; and the severity of our penal laws is mitigated by a milder system. Happily this liberal and benevolent spirit is not confined to Britain; it is universal in the states of the American Union; it is spreading widely through the more civilized countries of Europe.

INFLUENCE OF CHRISTIANITY.

No retrograde movement can now take place in civilization; the diffusion of Christian virtues and of knowledge ensures the progressive advancement of man, in those high moral and intellectual qualities that constitute his true dignity. But much yet remains to be done at home, especially in religious instruction and the prevention of crime; and abroad, millions of our fellow-creatures, in both hemispheres, are still in the lowest grade of barbarism. Ages and ages must pass away before they can be civilized; but if there be any analogy between the period of man's duration on earth and that of the frailest plant or shell-fish of the geological periods, he must still be in his infancy; and let those who doubt of his indefinite improvement compare the state of Europe in the middle ages, or only fifty years ago, with what it is at present. Some, who seem to have lived before their time, were then persecuted and punished for opinions which are now sanctioned by the legislature, and acknowledged by all. The moral disposition of the age appears in the refinement of conversation. Selfishness and evil passions may possibly ever be found in the human breast; but the progress of the race will consist in the increasing power of public opinion, the collective voice of mankind, regulated by the Christian principles of morality and justice. The individuality of man modifies his opinions and belief; it is a part of that variety which is a universal law of nature; so that there will probably always be difference of views as to religious doctrine, which, however, will become more spiritual, and freer from the taint of human infirmity; but the power of the Christian religion will appear in purer conduct, and in the more general practice of mutual forbearance, charity, and love.

SONTAG, HENRIETTA,

A VERY distinguished singer, was born at Co-blentz, in 1808. Her parents were actors, and Henrietta was brought on the stage at Frankfort when she was only five years old. In 1824, she performed at Berlin with great applause, and also at London and Paris. It was as a vocalist that she acquired her celebrity. Her voice was very clear and flexible, her acting fine, and her personal appearance attractive. About 1830, she married and left the stage.

For nearly twenty years this lady was heard of as the wife of count Rossi, a nobleman of distinguished rank, who was, at his marriage, the Sardinian minister at the court of Berlin. Some years afterwards he was sent ambassador to Russia, and during the missions of her husband at St. Petersburg, as well as at Berlin, Madame Sontag (now countess Rossi) was received at court with the greatest distinction, and delighted the circles of the king and the emperor by the occasional display of her genius;—at St. Petersburg she eclipsed all the female vocalists. In private life, her virtues and accomplishments rendered her respectable and admired. She was naturally benevolent, and her charities were immense. But in consequence of those reverses to which the most eminent have been liable in these revolutionary days, she had found it necessary again to resort to her talents as an artist. London was the place chosen for her reappearance. She sustained the character of Linda, in July, 1849, and was received with the warmest and most enthusiastic applause. She never in her girlhood created greater enthusiasm than she did at this and subsequent engagements in London, as well as in Paris and other European capitals. The surprising success of Jenny Lind in America induced her to try her fortunes here, and she arrived in New York in the autumn of 1852. Her triumphs in the concert-room and in the opera in every considerable town of the United States were unrivalled, except by Jenny Lind. In the fall of 1853, she went to the south, and after a successful engagement at New Orleans, proceeded to the city of Mexico. There, her series of artistic triumphs were arrested by the cholera, which terminated her life on the 16th of February, 1854.

Madame Sontag's character has always been unblemished. She was a lovely woman, and truly beloved for her goodness. Time had only perfected her beauty; and her great genius was adorned by her purity of life.

SOUTHEY, CAROLINE ANNE,

BETTER known in the literary world as Caroline Bowles, an English poetess of fine genius and tender piety, was born about the close of the last century. Her father was of an eminent family in the county of Wilts, and vicar of a parish in Northamptonshire: he gave his daughter an excellent education. Her talent for poetry was cultivated by her elder brother, the Rev. William Lisle Bowles, himself a master of the Christian lyre. Miss Bowles profited by these advantages and encouragements, and in 1820 her first work, "Ellen Fitzarthur," was published. Her next was, "The Winter's Tale, and other Poems," in 1822, which was well approved. In 1836, "The Birth-Day, and other Poems;" "A Collection of Prose and Poetical Pieces;" "Solitary Hours," &c.

In 1839, Miss Bowles became the second wife of Robert Southey, the poet, whom she tended, during his declining and infirm age, with the tenderness and sweet sympathy which kindred taste, admiring affection, and Christian love inspired. He died in 1843. Mrs. Southey has written little under her present name, but her early productions are sufficient to place her among the best poets of her sex.

"All high poetry must be religious," says Professor Wilson; and who that is conscious of possessing a soul that longs for immortality but feels the truth of this doctrine? There is an aspiration in every mind for something higher, better, lovelier, than can be found on earth; and it is the holiest office of poetry to embody in language these vague yearnings for happiness and purity; and paint, on the dark and torn canvass of human life, transparent and glowing pictures of heavenly beauty and tranquillity. Few writers have done this with more effect than Mrs. Southey. There is a sincerity, a devotedness, ay, and an enjoyment too, in her religious musings, which shows that Christian feeling has elevated the poetic sentiment in her heart till she can sing of the "better land" with the sure and sweet conviction of its reality and blessedness. In private life Mrs. Southey is the Christian lady, doing good and communicating happiness in her domestic pursuits as she does by her literary talents.

From "Solitary Hours, and other Poems."

I NEVER CAST A FLOWER AWAY.

I never cast a flower away,
The gift of one who cared for me—
A little flower—a faded flower—
But it was done reluctantly.

I never looked a last adieu
To things familiar, but my heart
Shrank with a feeling almost pain,
Even from their lifelessness to part.

I never spoke the word "Farewell,"
But with an utterance faint and broken,
An earth-sick longing for the time
When it shall never more be spoken.

THE TREAT.

Never tell me of loving by measure and weight,
As one's merits may lack or abound;
As if love could be carried to market like skate,
And cheapen'd for so much a-pound.

If it can — if yours can — let them have it who care;
You and I, friend, shall never agree;
Pack up, and to market be off with your ware;
It's a great deal too common for me;

D'ye linger? — d'ye laugh? — I'm in earnest, I vow,
Though perhaps over-hasty a thought;
If you're thinking to close with my terms as they are,
Well and good; but I won't bate a jot.

You must love me — we'll note the chief articles now,
To preclude all mistakes in our pact —
And I'll pledge ye, unask'd and beforehand, my vow
To give double for all I exact.

You must love me — not only through "evil report,"
When its falsehood you more than divine —
But when upon earth I can only resort
To your heart as a voucher for mine.

You must love — not my faults — but in spite of them, me,
For the very caprices that vex ye;
Nay, the more should you chance (as its likely) to see
'Tis my special delight to perplex ye.

You must love me, albeit all the world I offend
By impertinence, whimsies, conceit;
While assured (if you are not, all treaty must end)
That I never can stoop to deceit

While assured (as you must be, or there, too, we part)
That were all the world leagued against you,
To loosen one hair of your hold on my heart
Would be more than "life's labours" could do.

You must love me, howe'er I may take things amiss,
Whereof you in all conscience stand clear;
And although, when you'd fain make it up with a kiss,
Your reward be a box on the ear.

You must love me — not only when smiling and gay,
Complying, sweet-temper'd, and civil —
But when moping, and frowning, and froward, or — say
The thing plain out — as cross as the Devil.

You must love me in all moods — in seriousness, sport;
Under all change of circumstance, too:
Apart or together, in crowds, or, in short,
You must love me — because I love you.

AUTUMN FLOWERS.

Those few pale autumn flowers,
How beautiful they are!
Than all that went before,
Than all the summer store,
How lovelier far!

And why? They are the last!
The last! the last! the last!
Oh! by that little word,
How many thoughts are stirr'd —
That sister of the past!

Pale flowers! pale, perishing flowers!
Ye're types of precious things;
Types of those bitter moments,
That flit, like life's enjoyments,
On rapid, rapid wings;

Last hours with parting dear ones,
(That time that fastest spends)
Last tears in silence shed —
Last words half uttered —
Last looks of dying friends.

Who would but fain compress
A life into a day —
The last day spent with one
Who, ere the morrow's sun,
Must leave us, and for aye!

Oh, precious, precious moments!
Pale flowers! ye are types of those!
The saddest! sweetest! dearest!
Because, like those, the nearest
To an eternal close.

Pale flowers! — pale, perishing flowers!
I woo your gentle breath;
I leave the summer rose
For younger, blither brows.
Tell me of change and death

TO DEATH.

Come not in terrors clad, to claim
An unresisting prey;
Come like an evening shadow, Death!
So stealthily! so silently:
And shut mine eyes and steal my breath;
Then willingly, oh, willingly,
With thee I'll go away.

What need to clutch with iron grasp
What gentlest touch may take?
What need, with aspect dark, to scare
So awfully, so terribly?
The weary soul would hardly care,
Call'd quietly, call'd tenderly,
From thy dread power to break.

'Tis not as when thou markest out
The young, the blest, the gay;
The loved, the loving; they who dream
So happily so hopefully;
Then harsh thy kindest call may seem,
And shrinkingly, reluctantly,
The summon'd may obey.

But I have drunk enough of life
(The cup assign'd to me
Dash'd with a little sweet at best,
So scantily, so scantily)
To know full well that all the rest,
More bitterly, more bitterly,
Drugg'd to the last will be:

And I may live to pain some heart
That kindly cares for me —
To pain, but not to bless. O, Death!
Come quietly — come lovingly,
And shut mine eyes, and steal my breath
Then willingly, oh! willingly,
I'll go away with thee.

SOUTHWORTH, EMMA D. E. NEVITTE,

Is the daughter of the late Charles Le Compe Nevitte and Susannah George Wailes of St. Mary's, Maryland. On either side, her ancestors were French and English Roman Catholics, who came to America in 1632, with Calvert, and settled at St. Mary's, the first settlement in Maryland, where they became extensive land-holders. Here they continued to reside for nearly two hundred years, holding honourable posts, and taking an active part in the government of the province and the state. At the age of four, Miss Nevitte lost her father, and after that event resided with her grandmother, Mrs. Wailes, a Maryland lady of the old school, and a worthy member of the Episcopal church. Her mother was married a second time, to Joshua L. Henshaw, Esq., formerly of Boston; and to his personal instruction his step-daughter is indebted for all the education she received.

In 1841, Miss Nevitte became Mrs. Southworth; and in 1843, by a sudden and overwhelming misfortune, she was left destitute, with two infants to maintain. In 1846 she wrote her first sketch, and published it anonymously; her second story she sent to the "National Era," and its editor,

Dr. Bailey, not only approved the sketch, but saw so clearly the genius and power manifested by it, that he sought out the writer, and, by his encouragement, induced her to venture more boldly on the thorny path of authorship. Her principal productions are—"Retribution, or The Vale of Shadows," Harper & Brothers, N. Y., 1849; "The Deserted Wife," Appleton & Co., N. Y., 1850; "The Mother-in-Law, or The Isle of Rays," and "Shannondale," published in 1851. She has also written several very interesting tales and sketches for periodicals.

Mrs. Southworth is yet young, both as a woman and an author; but she is a writer of great promise, and we have reason to expect that the future productions of her pen will surpass those works with which she has already favoured the reading community—works showing great powers of the imagination, and strength and depth of feeling, it is true, but also written in a wild and extravagant manner, and occasionally with a freedom of expression that almost borders on impiety. This we are constrained to say, though we feel assured that no one would shrink more reluctantly than the young writer herself from coolly and calmly approaching, with too familiar a hand, the Persons and places held sacred by all the Christian world. She seems carried, by a fervid imagination, in an enthusiasm for depicting character as it is actually found (in which she excels,) beyond the limits prescribed by correct taste or good judgment. In other respects her novels are deeply interesting. They show, in every page, the hand of a writer of unusual genius and ability. In descriptions of Southern life, and of negro character and mode of expression, she is unequalled. She writes evidently from a full heart and an overflowing brain, and sends her works forth to the criticisms of an unimpassioned public without the advantage they would receive from a revision, and careful pruning, in some moment when calmer reflection was in the ascendancy.

From "The Deserted Wife."

EARLY IMPRESSIONS.

When I recollect the strong and decided bias, given in childhood to my own character by people and circumstances over which I had no sort of control, and against whose evil influence I could make no sort of resistance; when I suffer by the effect of impressions received in infancy, which neither time, reason, nor religion have been able to efface—which only sorrow could impair by bruising the tablet; knowing as I know the tender impressibility of infancy, feeling as I feel the indelibility of such impressions, I tremble for the unseen influences that may surround my own young children—ay, even for the chance word dropped by stranger lips, and heard by infant ears; for that word may be a fruitful seed that shall spring up into a healthful vine, or an Upas tree, twenty years after it is sown.

INFANCY.

Infancy is a fair page, upon which you may write goodness, happiness, heaven! or sin, misery, hell!—and the words once written, no chemical art can erase them. The substance of the paper itself must be rubbed through by the file of suffering before the writing can be effaced. Infancy is the soft metal in the moulder's hands; he may shape it in the image of a fiend, or the form of an angel—and when finished, the statue hardens into rock, which nothing but the hammer of God's providence can break; nothing but the fire of God's providence can melt for remoulding.

CHILDHOOD.

It is very wrong to make remarks on the personal beauty or ugliness of children in their hearing. The effect is invariably injurious. It is highly reprehensible to draw invidious comparisons between the beauty of children, especially before their faces. This thoughtlessness is fraught with the direst consequences. When you say, carelessly in their presence, that "Anne is prettier than Jane," and look at Anne as though her accidental beauty were a virtue, and look at Jane as though she were in fault—think that into the fertile soil of the children's hearts you have dropped the seeds of evil—the seed of vanity in the heart of Anne, the seed of envy into that of Jane, and the germ of discord into both.

UNHAPPY MARRIAGES AND THEIR CAUSES.

A primary cause of unhappy marriage is a defective moral and physical education. In our country, intellectual education is on a par with that of other enlightened nations of the earth—not so moral and physical education. Prudence, fortitude, truth, reverence, and fidelity, are not inculcated here as they should be. Industry, activity, and enterprise are our national good points of character, and these are impressed upon children by example, rather than by admonition; and our virtues, generosity, hospitality, courage, and patriotism, are the virtues of constitution and of circumstance, rather than of education.

We fail to impress the duty of PRUDENCE upon our children, and hence rash and culpable mercantile speculation, ending in insolvency—and hence hasty, inconsiderate marriages, ending in bankruptcy of heart, home, and happiness. We fail to impress the duty of FIDELITY upon our children, and hence irregularity and unfaithfulness in business, embezzlement of funds, &c., and hence broken marriage faith and deserted families.

We fail to inculcate the duty of FORTITUDE, and hence, when obligations, professional or matrimonial, become painful, they are too often abandoned.

But it is PHYSICAL EDUCATION, in its relation to the happiness of married life, that I wish to discuss. We are still more thoughtlessly neglectful, and I was about to say fatally neglectful, of physical, than of moral education. Fatally, because no moral education can be completely successful, unless assisted and supported by a good physical training.

An instance—preach patience for ever, yet a dyspeptic will be ill-tempered.

Another—preach industry for ever, yet the weak and languid will be lazy and idle.

A third—inculcate the necessity of courage, presence of mind, by eloquent precept, and by the example of all the heroes and heroines of history, yet the nervous will start if a door claps.

One might go on ad infinitum.

A defective physical education is one of the primary causes of unhappiness in the marriage relation. A girl cannot be a useful or a happy wife, and she cannot make her husband and her children happy, or even comfortable, unless she be a healthy woman. In Great Britain, a girl in delicate health never expects to be married, and her friends never desire it for her. American girls are proverbially delicate in organization, and frail in health, and their mothers were delicate before them, and their children will be still more delicate after them, unless there is a great reform in physical cultivation. Such a reform is happily beginning in the North. It is yet unthought of in the West and South. Daily exercise by walking, skipping rope, calisthenics, horseback riding, which bring all the limbs and muscles into play; daily bathing in cold water on first rising in the morning; fresh air, simple, plain food, the disuse of coffee and tea, comfortable clothing, the disuse of tight ligatures, corsets, tight-waisted dresses, tight shoes, &c., are the best features of this excellent system of physical training. I believe that a young person with a good constitution to commence with, faithfully following these means for the preservation of health, with the blessing of God, will not fade or break until she is fifty, nor die until she is an hundred years old. I believe that youth, health, beauty, strength, and life can be greatly prolonged beyond their present average, and that we were all intended to live twice or three times as long as with our sad maltreatment we do live.

MISMANAGEMENT OF CHILDREN.

American children (with the exception of a very few, whose parents know and practise better,) grow up drinking hot tea and coffee, eating hot meats and rich gravies and pastries, never bathing, taking little exercise, confined in crowded school-rooms or close house-rooms, and become narrow-shouldered, hollow-cheeked, pale, sickly, nervous, and fretful; they marry early companions as pale, sickly, nervous, and fretful as themselves, and have children twice as pale, sickly, nervous, and fretful as their parents, and discord and other domestic miseries are such inevitable results that we must pity, and can scarcely blame the victims. They cry out in their agony for separation, divorce, for reform in social laws, when the truth is, no reform would cure their evils without a reform in their personal habits; such a reform as would give health, consequently good humour, and lastly, happiness.

ILL-HEALTH.

Few people consider how much our moral as well as our physical health depends upon exercise, cleanliness, and temperance. How much our happiness depends upon a free circulation, unobstructed perspiration, and a good digestion. How much domestic discomfort is caused by the querulousness of ill-health. Many a man of weak and unsettled principles is driven to dissipation and vice, and, it may be, to crime, by the discomforts of his home, of his sickly and nervous wife, fretful and troublesome children.

EARLY COURTSHIP.

Another prominent cause of unhappy marriages is the too unguarded and unrestrained association between young persons of opposite sexes in the same rank of society. If the dress and address of a young man are passable, if his conduct is unimpeachable and his prospects fair, however otherwise unknown and untried, he may be admitted at once to the intimacy of a young lady, and after a brief courtship, too brief to give either a knowledge of their own or each other's hearts, take the last irrevocable step—marriage. And this youth of fair manners, fair appearance, and fair conduct, may turn out to be, if not positively depraved, yet weak, unstable, untried, possessing the best reputation, based upon the morality of externals, rather than the tested, sound integrity of heart; with the most defective character, totally unfit to guide himself, still less another, through the shoals and quicksands of life.

DANGERS OF SOCIETY TO THE YOUNG.

In old times of chivalry, a knight must have proved his prowess before he could successfully aspire to the hand of his lady-love. The days of knight-errantry are long past, but in the age of man, or of the world, the days of moral warfare are never over; never over with the world while it exists; never over with man until death; and I would have some better proof of moral force in an untried young man, than a few weeks of acquaintance, popularity, and mere amiability of manners would give, before I could trust the temporal and eternal welfare of my daughter to his keeping. When a young girl's heart is lost and won, it is too late for these prudential considerations; in this case, as in every other, the old proverb holds good—Tidarsi è bene, e non fidarse e meglio. The conversational acquaintanceship should be prevented from maturing into the dangerous intimacy. Yet do not misunderstand me; I would not have you pain or repulse a young heart by the coldness of suspicion. I would not have you shut yourselves up in a dark distrust and shut your doors and guard your girls with eastern jealousy; far from it; one need not run upon Scylla in avoiding Charybdis. "Moderation is the golden thread that holds together the bead-roll of the virtues." I would have you take the middle course—"the golden mean" between jealous surveillance and dangerous neglect. In all other civilized and enlightened society in the world, young ladies are carefully guarded and guided, chaperoned through the mazes of life. In countries of the Eastern Continent this system of surveillance is excessive; here it is reprehensibly deficient; in England it is perfect. I confess I would have our manners resemble the English in this respect.

PREMATURE MARRIAGES.

Still another primary cause (I speak only of primary causes here deeming discord, tyranny, drunkenness, infidelity and desertion, so many effects,) still another primary cause of unhappiness in the marriage state is, that marriage is contracted too early in life. American girls are proverbially married too young; at an age which even a hearty robust Englishwoman would scarcely be permitted to enter upon the responsibilities of marriage. How much more improper, then, must it be for an American girl, with her national extreme delicacy of organization, to take upon herself the heavy burdens and onerous duties of matrimony before her feeble constitution is mature, or her frail strength confirmed. But our girls, with all these natural disadvantages, are married early, and hence the early (proverbially again) wasting of health and life; the falling of beauty, decline of grace, and loss of attractions in the women; and hence the vexatious, nervous irritability so common in young mothers, so destructive to domestic harmony and happiness. How can it be otherwise with the continued tax of a young and increasing family upon the immature strength of the youthful wife and mother? Our girls are extremely fragile at best, and will ever be so, ay, and will grow more so, unless a better system of physical education is generally adopted. When these delicate girls prematurely assume the cares and burdens of a family, they break down under it, become thin, pale, sickly, nervous, and fretful; no longer attractive, almost repulsive; and the husband, father, if his disposition be benevolent and protective, as is the nature of most American men, suffers martyrdom; devotes himself a living sacrifice to his sickly wife and large family. I know hundreds of such devoted men, all unconscious of their self-devotion, passing their lives in dull counting-houses, dark stores, dingy offices, dirty work-shops, or crowded school-rooms, so cheerfully! to provide a comfortable or a luxurious home where their wives and children ever live, but where they only come to snatch a hasty meal, or, late at night, to sleep. This, I think, is what Dr. Dewey calls "The Religion of Toil." But if, on the other hand, this husband of the sickly wife, this father of the peevish children, this victim of early marriage and other abuses, happens to be selfish and unprincipled, he becomes, more or less, tyrant or reprobate, or he sometimes quietly leaves; goes to the West or South, to sea, or to parts unknown, and is never heard of again. If he be licentious as well as selfish, his wandering fancies fix upon some younger, fresher, fairer, or some new form; then comes the thought of the possibility, the probability, the almost certainty, if he pursues it, of getting a legal enfranchisement from his matrimonial bonds. And this is naturally suggested by the facility with which divorces are granted; true, he cannot legally repudiate his wife while she remains faithful, but he can oblige her to release him, or break her neck, or her heart, or desert and starve her into compliance with his measures; or he can wrest her children from her, and make their restoration to her bosom the price of his release. I am not exaggerating, reader; if you live in a city and will look about you, you will find that I speak truly. But to conclude, I reiterate and insist upon this point, that the fundamental causes of unhappiness are in married life, a defective moral and physical education, and a premature contraction of the matrimonial engagement.

STEPHENS, ANN S.,

Is a native of Derby, Connecticut. In 1831 she was married to Mr. Edward Stephens, and soon after removed to Portland, Maine, where her literary career commenced. In 1835 she established a periodical called "The Portland Magazine," which was edited by her for two years, and at tained considerable popularity, owing, chiefly, to her own contributions to it. In 1837 Mr. and Mrs. Stephens removed to New York, where they have since resided. Soon after her settlement in that city, she became editor of "The Ladies' Companion," and subsequently editor of the "Ladies' National Magazine;" an interesting and popular work. She has also been a regular and highly valued contributor to "Graham's Magazine," "The Columbia Magazine," and many of the other popular periodicals. For one of her stories, "Mary Derwent," she received a prize of four hundred dollars, yet it can by no means be considered her best. In truth, she is one of the most successful Magazine writers of the day; and her sketches and novellettes, if collected, would fill several volumes. As a poetess, Mrs. Stephens is comparatively but little known; the few pieces of hers that have appeared are marked by the same picturesque detail and easy flow of language with her prose sketches. She excels in drawing pictures with her pen—in placing before her readers, by a few graphic lines and glowing words, a character or scene, whether in high or low life, amid the palaces of royalty or the wild depths of the western forests, with such vividness and power that it seems to stand "a real presence" before the eye.

Mr. Charles J. Peterson, in some remarks on this well-known writer, which appeared in Graham's Magazine, says that Mrs. Stephens possesses "powers of description of the first order. She has an eye quick to perceive, and a pen skilful to trace the prominent parts of a picture. Like a painter, she throws her whole force on the objects in the front, finishing the background with a few bold masses of light and shade. No writer since Sir Walter Scott has excelled her in this.—In sketching rural scenery, she is perhaps without a rival. The village school—the white church on the hill—the walk through the twilight woods—the search after wild strawberries—the romp on the green—the old elm by the water side, and all the various pictures that pertain to country life, start into view with a few skilful touches of her pencil, and are remembered afterward, not as ideal scenes, but as familiar objects we have often visited. Her characters, and their actions, are described graphically, and often with minute skill. There is in her story of 'Malina Gray' a scene where a grey-headed father supplicates Mrs. Gray that her daughter, who was to have been married to his child, may see the dying young clergyman; and we shall never forget the elaborate detail with which the author describes the old man, trembling with heart-breaking emotion as he leans on his cane, while the Pharisaical mother quietly adjusts her knitting-needle in the sheath, places her work on the table, and listens with cold surprise to a request so opposite to her notions of propriety. The eager emotion of the father and the self-righteous composure of Mrs. Gray are finely contrasted. It is one of those pictures that time cannot efface from the memory. In various other of her tales are scenes described with equal force. The supper party in 'The Patch-Work Quilt' reminds us of the quiet humour, and minute detail, of the Flemish painters."

In speaking of her style, Mr. Peterson remarks that it "is sometimes too gorgeous, and would, now and then, bear softening. But of late she displays more chastened simplicity—the picture is toned down; and we think for the better. There is a passion and earnestness about her manner which distinguishes her from her contemporaries; she is more masculine and condensed in style than is usual with her sex. In her diction, regarded as distinct from style, she is a model. Her words are well chosen, and usually derived from old Saxon roots; and they come from her pen in sentences often glowing like melted lava."

In the autumn of 1850, Mrs. Stephens accompanied some friends on a tour through Europe and Eastern lands, expecting to be absent about two years. The opportunities this journey will afford a writer of her quick observation and remarkable powers of description, give us good reason to expect, on her return, a work of greater length and importance than any one she has yet put forth.

OUR HOMESTEAD.

Our homestead was an old-fashioned house, built before the Revolution. It had a sharp, narrow roof in front, and one that sloped almost to the ground at the back. Its white front and heavy stone chimneys were completely embowered by a clump of superb maples, whose heavy branches lay woven together, and entangling their foliage on the very roof, from the first budding time of spring till the leaves fell away in autumn. A thicket of damask roses, lilac trees, and snow-ball bushes luxuriated in their shelter, and a slope of rich, heavy sward—hedged in by a rustic fence—received just enough of the warm sunshine, that lay on it in the morning, and of the dews, which rained from the leaves at nightfall, to keep it thicker and more vividly green than any spot in the neighbourhood. The house occupied a verdant angle, formed by two roads that intersected each other in the heart of a lovely and secluded little village. Every window of our dwelling overlooked some pretty spot of scenery. Here was a white cottage, there a glimpse of the river with one end of the wooden bridge that spanned it. There was a view down a green vista of the river vale, farther on a breezy grove, and, on the east and west, ridges of grassy hills piled upon each other against the horizon and crested with forest trees.

From "A Story of Western Life."

A THUNDER STORM.

There had been a moon that evening, but the coming storm overwhelmed and shrouded it from sight. Still a pearly glow now and then shot along the small and gloomy clouds that came surging up from the north, and spread themselves over the sky like a lead-coloured pavement, torn and agitated by unseen hands. But soon even the pearly gleam disappeared. It had lingered among the clouds, the last smile on the face of heaven—now it was swept away, and left nothing but blackness and gloom behind. The air seemed pressing down to the earth, thick, stagnant, and sultry. A dismal sound came up from the forest, as if the elements were chained among those giant trees—moaning at their captivity and wrathful with each other—still, amid darkness and gloom, that horseman sped on. The road was narrow, and full of ruts. Stumps, in some places, stood half crumbling away in the very wagon track, but with a loosened rein, and knees pressed hard to his fleet animal, that doomed man plunged onward to his fate. The thunder, which had been all the time muttering on high, now pealed and crashed above him—the lightning came down in sheets of lurid fire, shedding a bluish tinge over the corpse-like hue of his face. Still his horse plunged on amid sheets of flame or black darkness, never checking his speed for an instant.

All at once that desperate rider drew the curb with a sharp pull, which brought the horse's foaming mouth down upon his chest. He staggered, fell back upon his haunches, and recovered himself with a snort of pain; but all the time the rider was bending forward till his face almost touched the arched neck of his beast, his knees were pressed convulsively to the drooping sides of the stumbling animal, and he strove again to catch the sound of hoofs which had for an instant reached him through the storm.

"On, on!" The words came hissing through his shut teeth, but scarcely had the gallant horse made a bound forward when the curb was fiercely drawn again.

"It is somewhere close by—oh, if the lightning would but strike again!"

It did strike, with a crash that made the brave horse leap in the air, though he had never shrunk from the lightning—not three rods before them, a dry tree was shivered in ten thousand pieces, and every splinter shot forth a stream of fire. For one moment the horseman recoiled, the next he recognized the spot.

"Thank God, there it is!" he exclaimed aloud, and with this blasphemous thanksgiving on his parted lips, he struck the horse and dashed into a cart-path, revealed by the stricken tree. On, without swerving from the path an instant, he passed directly under the burning tree, and was engulfed in the dark woods beyond.

THE PRISONER'S TRIAL.

Hunt was brought in and placed on a bench opposite the judge, who scrupulously averted his eyes from the prisoner's face while the jury was empannelled and the whole preliminaries entered upon. Never had a court been conducted with so much of imposing form at the Bend before. Every one looked grave, some even solemn, as the prisoner was arraigned. Hunt stood up; his lips turned white, and his hands, which he clasped over his breast, shook a little, but his eyes were bent full on the judge, and he answered "Not guilty, not guilty, so help me God!" in a voice that swelled clear and full through the listening crowd.

As the prisoner sat down again Hannah cast a look over the crowd, rose to her feet, and, supporting her faltering steps by pressing her hand to the wall, went round to the bench he occupied and crept timidly to his side. He did not turn his head or seem to be conscious of the action, but the lines about his mouth began to quiver, and he shut his heavy eyelids hard together once or twice, as if determined to force back the moisture from his eyes before it had time to form into tears.

This stern effort to subdue the feelings tugging at his heart, joined to the feeble and desolate air with which the poor girl had performed her simple act of devotion, had its effect upon the impulsive and ardent beings who surrounded them. That gentle creature, so young, so pure, and helpless, as she crept through the outskirts of the crowd like a pretty fawn following the hunted stag even among the hounds, and crouched down by the only being left to her on earth, touched their sympathies more than a thousand orations would have done. Though rude backwoods-men, feeling, good and generous feeling, was vigorous in their tough hearts. A whisper ran through the crowd; many an unequal breath was drawn, and more than one heavy lip trembled without speaking. The foreman of the jury—a bluff, hale old fellow—drew his coat-sleeve across his eyes two or three times. The judge turned uneasily in his chair, and seemed to be diligently counting the glasses crowded on a shelf behind him; while the blacksmith's wife lifted a flaring cotton handkerchief to her face, shook her huge navarino bonnet mournfully, and sobbed aloud.

"This will never do," whispered the prosecuting attorney, leaning toward William Wheeler, who stood close behind him; "who put the girl up to this stage effect?"

Wheeler only replied by a sarcastic and yet ghastly smile. The pompous young lawyer then turned to the judge.

"May it please your honour, I desire that the young woman there may be removed from the court until she is called up as a witness," he said, pointing toward poor Hannah.

The blacksmith's wife flung back her navarino, grasped the handkerchief in her hand, and gave the lawyer a look that would have demolished a man of common nerve. The judge turned hastily on his seat; "I'll see you—" He checked himself just in time, took up one of the law-books, as if to seek for some authority, and then replied with solemn dignity, "The court has decided that it is no business of yours where the girl sits."

David Hunt, who had grasped his daughter's hand and half risen, sunk back to his seat again as these words fell on his ear, and a murmur of approbation passed through the crowd.

STRICKLAND, AGNES,

WHOSE graceful pen has made the dead queens of England objects of deep interest to the living world, may justly be classed among the most eminent English female writers of the day. She resides at Reydon Hall, Suffolk County, about twenty miles from London. Miss Strickland is descended from an eminent and honourable family, the Nevilles, of Raby, who were connexions, in a remote degree, of the good Queen, Katharine Parr. We name this circumstance because of the influence such a reminiscence has undoubtedly exerted over the mind and pursuits of Miss Strickland. The love and reverence she was taught from childhood to cherish for the queen of her own ancestral line made the lives of these royal ladies the most interesting theme she could study or illustrate.

The reading public of America, as well as of Great Britain, are too familiar with the result of these studies to require any description thereof; yet few, probably, have considered the labour as well as talent involved in the great work of these ladies;—there are two Miss Stricklands united in this literary enterprise, though one sister withholds her name. “Lives of the Queens of England, from the Norman Conquest, with Anecdotes,” is the title; the work is in twelve volumes. The first three were published in 1840; the others appeared at intervals of a year or more till 1848; the volume containing the history of Queen Anne completed the series.

We know nothing about the aims of literature more difficult than to write history well: learning, conscientiousness, the patient spirit of research, time and opportunities for such research, unflagging industry, penetration into character, a philosophic power of observation and reflection, are some of the requisites for an historian. Besides, one should be a universal reader, and versed in science; for how shall the historian describe an epoch if unacquainted with its intellectual advancement? Then the writer must have the poet’s sensibility to discover depths of feeling and passion, and a real enthusiasm for heroic and generous deeds; also the picturesque faculty of seeing the groups evolved from the dust of antiquity and the shelves of the library, in order to paint them living beings—not departed forms—with vigour, spirit, taste. If we go on augmenting, some reader may say, as Rasselas did to the philosopher—“I perceive it is impossible to become an”—historian.

Miss Strickland has not, certainly, attained all the requisites; yet she has proved herself a very useful writer. Her “Queens of England” have induced many to whom stronger diet would have been unpalatable to gain a respectable knowledge of the leading facts of English history. For her own sex her work is not only of deep interest, but must prove in many ways highly beneficial. Her own unwearied industry is an example of much importance; the devotion of her talents to a great subject is another commendable trait in her character; and the success attending her labours has a wide influence for good. Miss Strickland has incurred considerable censure from some of the British critics on account of her High Church and Tory principles, which she never attempts to conceal; but she seems so thoroughly convinced of the truth of her own opinions, that we must believe she is honestly sure her statements are correct. In short, she is a sincere Queen-worshipper; and certainly, if there be a “divinity” to hedge kings, who have usually been very poor specimens of humanity, queens may well be exalted. Since she commenced her work, other biographies of some of these royal ladies have appeared, but none has equalled Miss Strickland’s in the interest of the narrative or in the originality of materials.

We have passed over the earlier writings of Miss Strickland, yet these deserve mention. “The Pilgrims of Walsingham, or Tales of the Middle Ages; an Historical Romance,” containing some well-told stories, has gone through numerous editions, and obtained much popular favour in England, and been republished in the United States several times. Miss Strickland has also written poetry worthy of notice, if her prose had not excelled it. She is now engaged in writing the “Lives of the Queens of Scotland,” the first volume of which has appeared.

From “The Queens of England,” vol. xii.

BRITISH QUEENS.

Whether beloved or not, the influence of the wife and companion of the sovereign must always be considerable; and, for the honour of woman-kind, be it remembered that it has, generally speaking, been exerted for worthy purposes. Our Queens have been instruments in the hands of God, for the advancement of civilization and the exercise of a moral and religious influence. Many of them have been brought from foreign climes to plant the flowers and refinements of a more polished state of society in our own; and well have they, for the most part, performed their mission.

ROMAN CATHOLIC QUEENS.

Enough of sin, enough of sorrow, have surely been related of Queens of the Romish church to satisfy any candid reader that they have been portrayed not according to the ideal perfections of angelic beings, but with all the follies, the inconsistencies, the frailties to which fallen and corrupt human nature is heir. If we had represented them otherwise, we should have acted as absurdly as those who argue, after the fashion of stultified heathens, by raising a clamour, and reiterating cries of, “Great is the Diana of the Ephesians.”

PROTESTANT QUEENS.

Katharine Parr was the preserver of our universities and the nursing-mother of the Reformation; and here it is impossible to refrain from referring the reader to our life of that illustrious lady,* as a sufficient refutation of the ridiculous accusation put forth in letters, which have been addressed to the editors of daily and weekly papers, complaining of our unjust partiality “in having made angels of all the popish Queens, and demons of all the protestant Queens;” as if it were in the power of biographers to make historical characters any thing but what they were, or just to blame them for recording facts for which authentic authorities are given. Our affections are naturally on the side of the Queens of the reformed church, to which we ourselves belong. It is a church which enjoins truth, and we do not pay her so ill a compliment as to imply that she requires the sophistries of falsehood to bolster up her cause. It is impossible for any rational person to draw controversial inferences from the relative merits of Roman Catholic and Protestant Queens, since no two of them have been placed in similar circumstances.

* See Lives of the Queens, vol. v.

T.

TARNOW, FANNY,

Is one of the most remarkable and most fertile of all the modern German authoresses. Her genius was developed by misfortune and suffering: while yet an infant, she fell from a window two stories high, and was taken up, to the amazement of the assistants, without any apparent injury, except a few bruises; but all the vital functions suffered, and during ten or twelve years she was extended on a couch, neither joining in any of the amusements of childhood, nor subjected to the usual routine of female education. She educated herself. She read incessantly, and, as it was her only pleasure, books of every description, good and bad, were furnished her without restraint. She was about eleven years old when she made her first known poetical attempt, inspired by her own feelings and situation. It was a dialogue between herself and the angel of death. In her seventeenth year she was sufficiently recovered to take charge of her father's family, after he had lost, by some sudden misfortune, his whole property. He held, subsequently, a small office under government, the duties of which were principally performed by his admirable daughter. Her first writings were anonymous, and for a long time her name was unknown. Her most celebrated novel, the "Thekla," was published in 1815; and from this time she has enjoyed a high and public reputation. Fanny Tarnow resides, or did reside, in Dresden.

TASTU, SABINE CASIMIR AMABLE VOREST,

Was born at Metz, in 1798. She has taken several prizes offered by literary academies, and holds a place among the first rank of contemporary French poets. Her verses are written with great elegance, while the sentiments they convey are refined and moral. She has been very successful in her books for young persons.

THEIS DE CONSTANCE, MARIE, PRINCESS OF SALM DYCK,

Was born at Nantes, 7th November, 1767. After having received a very brilliant education, she, in 1789, married M. Pipelet, a physician of considerable celebrity, and established herself in Paris, where she indulged her taste for literature in a congenial atmosphere. One of her first works was the poetical drama of "Sapho," an opera in four acts, which was adapted to music by Martini, and went through a hundred representations at the Theatre Louvois. Poetical Epistles, Dramas, and various other productions in verse, read by Madame Pipelet at the Athenæum at Paris, and afterwards published, obtained for her an honourable reputation in the literary world. She has also published several ballads, of which she composed the melodies and the piano accompaniments. In 1803, she became the wife of the count de Salm Dyck, who took the title of prince in 1816. Since that time the princess de Salm has lived alternately on the estates of her husband, in Germany, and at Paris, where, by her wit, her conversational powers, and her amiable manners, she has always rallied round her the élite of artists, and men of letters.

THIERRY, MADAME,

Is the wife of the distinguished historian, and has merited a very charming acknowledgment from that illustrious author. In one of his prefaces, adverting to his misfortune—one of the greatest to a man fond of books, his blindness—he declares that "his wife has been to him his eyes, his memory, his unfailing helpmate; without whom his great works could scarcely have been accomplished, so untiring and intelligent was her constant assistance; adding to the offices of a zealous secretary, the sympathy and encouragement of affection."

He adds that her abilities are equal, if not superior, to his own; and that only her extreme modesty prevents her undertaking works of importance. In this opinion we cannot concur with the author of the "Norman Conquest." The sketches Madame Thierry has published are pretty stories, neatly written, and nothing more. "Scènes de Mœurs," and "Adelaide," could only have been written by a woman of cultivated and elegant mind, but they evince no extraordinary intellectual powers. Still, we consider her entitled to a high place among distinguished women, because she has won from her husband such a beautiful eulogium on her talents, and on the manner in which she has employed them. We may see, in this example, of what inestimable benefit to the husband the cultivated intellect of the wife may become, if he has true nobleness of soul to encourage the development and rightly estimate the mind of his wife.

TOWNSEND, ELIZA,

Was born in Boston, Massachusetts, where she still resides, during the latter part of the eighteenth century. All her early poems, though attracting attention and favourable notice for the poetic genius they displayed, were published anonymously, and for many years her authorship was kept a secret, which has prevented her from being as widely known as she would otherwise have been. Her poem on "The Incomprehensibility of God" is generally considered her best; and in a criticism on this, the Rev. Dr. Cheever remarks that "it is equal in grandeur to the Thanatopsis of Bryant," and that "it will not suffer by comparison with the most sublime pieces of Wordsworth or Col-ridge." Though this praise may be somewhat too high, yet it shows among what class of poets Miss Townsend may claim a place—those in whom religious feeling, thoughtfulness, and a deep, if quiet enthusiasm are the leading traits. Her productions have generally appeared in the different religious periodicals of New England, and no collection of them has ever been made. Mr. Griswold, whose work on "The Female Poets of America" is well known, says of this writer:—"There is a religious and poetical dignity, with all the evidences of a fine and richly-cultivated understanding, in most of the poems of Miss Townsend, which entitle her to be ranked among the distinguished literary women who were her contemporaries, and in advance of all who in her own country preceded her."

THE INCOMPREHENSIBILITY OF GOD.

Where art thou?—Thou! source and support of all!
That is or seen or felt; thyself unseen,
Unfelt, unknown—alas, unknowable!
I look abroad among thy works—the sky,
Vast, distant, glorious with its world of suns—
Life-giving earth, and ever-moving main,
And speaking winds—and ask if these are thee!
The stars that twinkle on, the eternal hills,
The restless tide's outgoing and return,
The omnipresent and deep-breathing air—
Though hailed as gods of old, and only less,
Are not the Power I seek; are thine, not thee!
I ask thee from the past: if, in the years,
Since first intelligence could search its source,
Or in some former unremembered being,
(If such, perchance, were mine), did they behold thee?
And next interrogate Futurity,
So fondly tenanted with better things
Than e'er experience owned—but both are mute;
And Past and Future, vocal on all else,
So full of memories and phantasies,
Are deaf and speechless here! Fatigued, I turn
From all vain parley with the elements,
And close my eyes, and bid the thought turn inward
From each material thing its anxious guest,
If, in the stillness of the waiting soul,
He may vouchsafe himself—Spirit to spirit!
O Thou, at once most dreaded and desired,
Pavilioned still in darkness, wilt thou hide thee?
What though the rash request be fraught with fate,
Nor human eye may look on thine and live?
Welcome the penalty! let that come now,
Which soon or late must come. For light like this
Who would not dare to die?

Peace, my proud aim,
And hush the wish that knows not what it asks.
Await His will, who hath appointed this,
With every other trial. Be that will Done now, as ever. For thy curious search,
And unprepared solicitude to gaze
On Him—the Unrevealed—learn hence, instead,
To temper highest hope with humbleness.
Pass thy novitiate in these outer courts,
Till rent the veil, no longer separating
The Holiest of all—as erst, disclosing
A brighter dispensation; whose results
Ineffable, interminable, tend
Even to the perfecting thyself—thy kind—
Till meet for that sublime beatitude,
By the firm promise of a voice from heaven
Pledged to the pure in heart!

TROLLOPE, MRS.,

HAS acquired a wide notoriety, and made large profits by her writings; yet few of her sex would, we think, be willing to stand in her place, and bear her name, for all she has gained. Born in England, about 1787, she was unknown to literary fame until she had reached the sober season of married and middle life, when she suddenly burst forth like a meteor, whose erratic course makes it an object of curiosity its own nature would never have awakened. In this sketch of Mrs. Trollope we shall give the notices by her own countrymen, British critics, whose fairness regarding her productions, on all points save one, may be considered established. Mr. Chambers, in his "Cyclopaedia of English Literature," thus expresses his opinion: "Mrs. Trollope first came before the public in 1832, when her 'Domestic Manners of the Americans' was published, and excited much attention. She drew so severe a picture of American faults and foibles—of their want of delicacy, their affectations, drinking, coarse selfishness, and ridiculous peculiarities—that the whole nation was incensed at their English satirist. There is much exaggeration in Mrs. Trollope's sketches; but having truth for their foundation, her book is supposed to have had some effect in reforming the 'minor morals' and social habits of the Americans. The same year our authoress continued her satiric portraits in a novel entitled 'The Refugee in America,' marked by the same traits as her former work, but exhibiting little art or talent in the construction of a fable. Mrs. Trollope now tried new ground. In 1833 she published 'Belgium;' and 'Western Germany' in 1834, countries where she found much more to gratify and interest her than in America, and where she travelled in generally good humour. The only serious evil which Mrs. Trollope seems to have encountered in Germany was the tobacco-smoke, which she vituperates with unwearied perseverance. In 1837 she presented another novel, 'The Vicar of Wrexhill,' an able and entertaining work, full of prejudices, but containing some excellent painting of manners and eccentricities. In 1838 our authoress appears again as a traveller. 'Vienna and the Austrians' was of the same cast as 'Belgium and Germany,' but more deformed by prejudice. This journey also afforded Mrs. Trollope materials for a novel, which she entitled 'A Romance of Vienna.' Three novels were the fruit of 1839; namely, 'The Widow Barnaby,' a highly amusing work, particularly the delineation of the bustling, scheming, unprincipled husband-hunting widow; 'Michael Armstrong, or the Factory Boy,' a caricature of the evils attendant on the manufacturing system; and 'One Fault,' a domestic story, illustrating with uncommon vigour and effect the dismal consequences of that species of bad temper which proceeds from pride and over-sensitiveness. In 1840 we had 'The Widow Married;' and in 1841 'The Blue Belles of England,' and 'Charles Chesterfield.' The latter relates the history of a youth of genius, and contains a satirical picture of the state of literature in England, branding authors, editors, and publishers with unprincipled profligacy, selfishness and corruption. In 1842 Mrs. Trollope, besides throwing off another novel, 'The Ward of Thorpe Combe, gave the public the result of a second visit to Belgium, describing the changes that had been effected since 1833, and also 'A Visit to Italy.' The smart caustic style of our authoress was not so well adapted to the classic scenes, manners, and antiquities of Italy, as to the broader features of American life and character, and this work was not so successful as her previous publications. Returning to fiction, we find Mrs. Trollope, as usual, prolific. Three novels, of three volumes each, were the produce of 1843 — 'Hargrave,' 'Jessie Phillips,' and 'The Lauringtons.' The first is a sketch of a man of fashion; the second an attack on the new English poor-law; and the third a lively satire on 'superior people,' the 'bustling Botherbys' of society. Reviewing the aggregate labours of this industrious authoress, we cannot say that she has done good proportioned to her talents. Her satire is directed against the mere superficialities of life, and is not calculated to check vice or encourage virtue. In depicting high life, she wants the genial spirit and humanity of Theodore Hook. She has scattered amusement among novel-readers by some of her delineations; but in all her mirth there is a mocking and bitter spirit, which is often as misplaced as it is unfeminine."

From another critic, Mr. R. H. Home, author of A New Spirit of the Age, we take the following: "The class to which Mrs. Trollope belongs is, fortunately, very small; but it will always be recruited from the ranks of the unscrupulous, so long as a corrupt taste is likely to yield a trifling profit. She owes every thing to that audacious contempt of public opinion which is the distinguishing mark of persons who are said to stick at nothing. Nothing but this sticking at nothing could have produced some of the books she has written in which her wonderful impunity of face is so remarkable. Her constitutional coarseness is the natural element of a low popularity, and is sure to pass for cleverness, shrewdness, and strength, where cultivated judgment and chaste inspiration would be thrown away. Her books of travel are crowded with plebeian criticisms on works of art and the usages of courts, and are doubtless held in great esteem by her admirers, who love to see such things overhauled and dragged down to their own level. The book on America is of a different class. The subject exactly suited her style and her taste, and people looked on at the fun as they would at a scramble of sweeps in the kennel; while the reflecting few thought it a little unfair in Mrs. Trollope to find fault with the manners of the Americans. Happy for her she had such a topic to begin with. Had she commenced her literary career with Austria or France, in all likelihood, she would have ended it there.

"But it is to her novels she is chiefly indebted for her current reputation; and it is here her defects are most glaringly exhibited. She cannot adapt herself to the characterization requisite in a work of fiction; she cannot go out of herself; she serves up every thing with the same sauce; the predominant flavour is Trollope still. The plot is always preposterous, and the actors in it seem to be eternally bullying each other. She takes a strange delight in the hideous and revolting, and dwells with gusto upon the sins of vulgarity. Her sensitiveness upon this point is striking. She never omits an opportunity of detailing the faults of low-bred people, and even goes out of her way to fasten the stigma upon others who ought to have been more gently tasselled. Then her low people are sunk deeper than the lowest depths, as if they had been bred in and in, to the last drops. Nothing can exceed the vulgarity of Mrs. Trollope's mob of characters, except the vulgarity of her select aristocracy. That is transcendent — it caps the climax.

"We have heard it urged on behalf of Mrs. Trollope, that her novels are, at all events, drawn from life. So are sign-paintings. It is no great proof of their truth that centaurs and griffins do not run loose through her pages, and that her men and women have neither hoofs nor tails. The tawdriest wax-works, girt up in paste and spangles, are also 'drawn from life;' but there ends the resemblance."

This last critic is an Englishman, or it might reasonably be urged that if Mrs. Trollope is low in her tastes, vulgar in her ideas, and not worthy of credit when writing on any subject — except the Americans, her statements respecting their "Domestic Manners" might possibly take their colouring from her own mind and character. But all abuse of Americans has been so pleasant to English taste, that even Mrs. Trollope was praised and paid for her first coarse caricatures, till she, naturally enough, fancied herself gifted, to shine among the best of England's writers. They are welcome to a monopoly of her fame; we only regret that she belongs to the female sex.

A few words are all that is needed to explain her dislike of America. We quote from a sketch which appeared in the Knickerbocker in 1833, written by the Rev. Timothy Flint, who resided in Cincinnati during the sojourn of Mrs. Trollope in that city. He judges her more kindly than do her English critics:

"In reply to the question which has been asked us, we are sure, a thousand times, what sort of a person was Mrs. Trollope, and what were her objects in visiting America? we reply, she was in person a short, plump figure, with a ruddy, round, Saxon face, of bright complexion, forty-five, though not showing older than thirty-seven, of appearance singularly unladylike, a misfortune heightened by her want of taste and female intelligence in regard to dress, or her holding herself utterly above such considerations, though at times she was as much finer and more expensively dressed than other ladies, as she was ordinarily inferior to them in her costume. Robust and masculine in her habits, she had no fear of the elements; recklessly exposing herself in long walks to the fierce meridian sun or the pouring shower, owing a severe fever, no doubt, to those circumstances. Voluble as a French woman, shrill and piercing in the tones of her voice, piquant and sarcastic in the tenor of her conversation, she was a most accomplished mimic; and as she had travelled in France and Italy, and knew the language and light literature of both these countries, and was, moreover, acquainted, as we know from her correspondence, with the most distinguished men and women of genius in England; as she was, in particular, perfectly au fait in regard to every thing that concerned theatricals and play-writing and play-going people; as she had seen every body and knew every body in Europe of whom we hear, her conversation was remarkably amusing.

She was in correspondence while in this country, as we know, with Miss Mitford and Miss Landon, and, we believe, with Campbell, the poet, and other names well known to fame. Having been trained to the expectation of inheriting a great fortune, and having views of conventional morals and decorum not of the severer class, not restrained by religious considerations, and mixing much with the gay and pleasure-seeking, she had probably run through the common and allowed range of fashion, and exhausted the common forms of pleasure and worn it all out to satiety; though we have every reason to believe that, while in America, whatever liberty she may have taken with the lesser morals, she was exemplary in her observance of the higher duties; she was amiable in the highest degree in her relations with the people about her in the suburbs of Cincinnati, where she resided during the greater part of her stay in America, and among whom she was extremely popular; enacting among them Lady Bountiful with a graciousness of distribution, and nursing the sick, which every where gains favour. Besides Hervieu, an accomplished French painter, she was accompanied by her son and two daughters."

Mr. Flint goes on to state that Mrs. Trollope came to America in the spring of 1829; to cooperate with Miss Fanny Wright, another British eccentric, who, at Nashoba, Tennessee, was engaged in her famous and failing experiment of cultivating the Ethiopians. Mrs. Trollope was soon disgusted. After spending two days at Nashoba, she fled from the negro settlement, came to Cincinnati, Ohio, where she passed two winters building her huge Turkish bazaar, which cost her $24,000, on which, paying $12,000 and repudiating the remainder, she departed for England. But the disappointment of her hopes was not her severest trial. Owing to her want of letters of introduction and to her vulgar appearance, she was never visited or invited into society while in Cincinnati, never attended a party, nor was admitted into but four families; and those, though respectable, did not give parties. Such was her knowledge of America.

We have not named all her works. In 1849 she published "Young Love," a novel, which a writer in the London Athenæum thus reports: "The masculine vigour and shrewdness developed in Mrs. Trollope's earlier novels, won for them a popularity which is fast waning from the sameness of material and feebleness of plot exhibited in each succeeding work. The announcement, however, of one bearing the above title, was likely enough, after the politic fashion of Mr. Bayes, to 'surprise' the public into a purchase, although it did not in the slightest degree whet our appetite; for we should be perplexed to name a writer less likely to pourtray, in its truth and beauty, the purity and poetry, 'to dally with the innocence' of 'Young Love.'"

Her latest work, issued in 1850, was "Petticoat Government;" a miserable attempt to be piquant and witty on a subject that Caudle had completed.

TUTHILL, LOUISA C.,

Was born and educated in New Haven, Connecticut. She enjoyed the best advantages, both as to schools and society, and in her girlhood began to amuse herself with attempts at poems, plays, and novels. But no one was ever allowed to scrutinize these juvenile efforts, and before her marriage they were devoted to a general conflagration. She was married in 1817, at a very early age, to Cornelius Tuthill, Esq., a distinguished member of the bar in New Haven, and fond of science and literature. He encouraged his wife in her literary tastes and pursuits, and surprised her by causing one of her poems to be published without her knowledge, which was her first appearance in print. In 1825 Mrs. Tuthill was left a young widow with four children, and to solace herself under her heavy affliction she had recourse to her pen. At this time she wrote "James Somers, the Pilgrim's Son," published in 1827, and "Mary's Visit to B.," in 1829. She continued to write anonymously for periodical literature for some time, and in 1848-9, published "The Young Lady's Reader," and "Young Lady's Friend;" the first works to which her name was attached. In 1842 Mrs. Tuthill removed to the vicinity of Boston, where she wrote "I will be a Gentleman," and "I will be a Lady;" books for the young, which have been very successful. She continued the series, and produced "Onward, Right Onward," "Anything for Sport," "The Boarding-School Girl," "A Strike for Freedom," and "My Wife," a story in one volume. Not long after, having removed to Philadelphia, Mrs. Tuthill published "The History of Architecture;" a very interesting work on an art but little understood, and for the study of which the authoress had enjoyed unusual facilities. Within the last three years there have appeared from the same writer "The Nursery Book for Young Mothers," and three little works, "The Merchant," "The Lawyer," and "The Mechanic;" part of a series entitled "Success in Life."

Mrs. Tuthill is a pleasant writer; her cheerful spirit and hopeful philosophy give an attractive charm even to good advice; which, like medicine, requires often to be sugared before it is willingly taken. All her writings bear the stamp of an earnest purpose to promote the best interests of society; she has read much, and uses her knowledge of books skilfully to illustrate her own views. There is also a pure current of pious feeling, flowing, as it were, from her warm heart, that freshens old thoughts and keeps her literary field bright with the flowers that never die.

From "The Young Lady's Home."

A DAUGHTER'S DUTY.

How few daughters are fully aware of the sacrifices made for them by their parents! Your father, year after year, has toiled, perhaps, for that wealth which enables him to give you the luxuries and elegances of life. Day and night has his anxious mind been exercised for your welfare. He has spared you from home and its duties and given up the pleasure of your society and your assistance to fit you for life. Or, if you have been so happy as to remain beneath the parental roof, you have probably been so occupied with your intellectual education as to have had little time to devote to him. Now that you have more leisure, enquire how you shall contribute to your father's comfort and enjoyment. Have you acquired accomplishments? Consider it the highest gratification they can afford you to exercise them for his amusement. Let the voice which he has been the means of cultivating yield its sweetest notes for his pleasure; let his praise be more welcome to your ear than the applause of thousands.

BEHAVIOUR TO SERVANTS.

Never ring for a servant unless it is absolutely necessary; consider whether you have a right to make even your own waiting-maid take forty steps to save yourself one. Nothing shows a person's ill-breeding more plainly than a harsh, imperious manner towards servants. Knowing how much more agreeable it is to be requested than commanded, it would seem as if every one might say, "Will you do this?" or even, "Please do that;" and there would be no want of propriety in saying, "Will you have the kindness to do it?" Human nature resents the imperative mood, but yields a ready acquiescence to gentle entreaty. You must not suppose that all servants are of course merely mercenary; they may serve with affection, and possess a keen sensibility to kindness. An amiable dignity of deportment, joined with considerateness, and a hearty desire for their good, may secure faithful, humble allies, whose interests are identified with your own. Avoiding that familiarity which the old proverb says breeds "contempt," consider what is really due to the feelings and character of a faithful domestic, and demonstrate by your conduct that you have no contempt for those whom Providence has placed in a subordinate station, and that you recognise no vulgarity but such as arises from a low and vicious character.

HOME HABITS.

A young lady who would be prepared for the responsible situation of a wife and the respected mistress of a household, has much to learn at her mother's fireside. A cumbrous set of rules and maxims hung about one, like the charms which the gree-gree man sells to the poor African, will not ward off the evils, nor furnish an antidote to the trials, of life. It is by the habitual exercise of those affections and those principles which make her the light and life of her father's hearth and hall, that a young lady becomes fitted for another station. At home she is in the genial school ordained by Providence for the nurture of those "flowers of loveliness" which will beautify another habitation. The habit of cheerful acquiescence to the will of others may be acquired by submission to the will of parents; self-denial, by yielding to brothers and sisters; consideration for the welfare of dependants, by care not to give unnecessary trouble to servants. A young lady who is not an affectionate, docile daughter, a loving, kind sister, cannot make a good wife.

* * * * *

The well-spring of the affections is in your own hearts; let it not be a sealed fountain; let your love cheer your father, mother, brothers, sisters, friends, and your gentle, docile submission to lawful authority, prove that it has been well for you "to bear the yoke in your youth."

SOCIETY.

Does society claim an exorbitant share of time? This sacrifice is often yielded as if demanded by that "necessity that knows no law." The hours spent in society are but a small proportion of the time thus yielded; previous preparation for these hours makes a far more exorbitant demand. Tasteful embroidery and fine needlework afford pleasant occupation to young ladies; but when employed solely for the decoration of the person, they may be treacherous monopolizers. One young lady has been known to spend two months upon the trimming to a ball-dress, and another a half-year upon an embroidered satin dress. Patient, persevering industry, which, applied to better purposes than the gratification of vanity and selfishness, would deserve high encomium; and perhaps, after all this pains-taking, society would have been as well pleased without the trimming and embroidery.

* * * * *

Acknowledging that society has claims, and that you are to maintain kind and friendly relations with the circle to which you belong; yet, neither these claims, nor your love of display, nor your fondness for amusement, should lead you to the sacrifice of personal happiness and of principle.

CONVERSATION.

The literature of the day, improvement in the arts, discoveries in science, the important events that are taking place in the world, the efforts being made for the diffusion of knowledge and religion,—these, and a thousand other interesting topics, men might talk about in the society of ladies without lowering their own minds or elevating beyond their capacity those of their auditors, or rather colloquists; for it is assumed that here they meet on terms of perfect equality. If it be said that, by courtesy, it is left for the ladies to take the lead, then they are to blame if they find no higher themes for entertainment than fashions, beauty, dress, manners, flattery, and scandal. Making large allowance for their fondness for these topics, candour must allow that modesty, in many instances, and the fear of ridicule in others, deter them from bringing forward other less trifling subjects in which they are deeply interested. Cicero says of silence,—“There is not only an art, but an eloquence in it;” let, then, your silence be eloquent whenever frivolous or unsuitable subjects are introduced; it is often the only delicate way in which you can manifest disapprobation.

CHRISTIANITY.

Woman owes her present elevation of character and condition to Christianity; in all countries where its benign, holy influence is unfelt, she is still an unintellectual, a degraded being; and just in proportion to its purity and its power over a people is her domestic happiness.

INDEPENDENCE.

You cannot fulfil the duties that devolve upon you in relation to others without some independence. You cannot live without exerting influence; perhaps many look to you for example; if your course is uncertain as that of the fluttering insect, governed by the impulse of the moment, you can hardly fail to mislead. Generous impulses, noble impulses, are often lauded; but so long as the human heart is sinful, you may not trust implicitly to its impulses; they may be right, but it is mournfully certain that they may be wrong.

PRINCIPLES.

The Bible contains two grand, ultimate principles: namely, holiness produces happiness; sin, misery. All the commands of God are founded upon this immutable truth; the precepts of the gospel flow from the same source. “Thou shalt love the Lord with all thy heart, and thy neighbour as thyself.” “Do unto others as you would that others should do unto you.”

CONSISTENCY.

Consistency of character is the very keystone of the arch; giving completeness and strength to all the virtues.

In order to be consistent in the right way, you must have a just sense of the importance of the objects at which you aim. A consistent lawyer is one who applies all his learning, his zeal, and his eloquence, to gain a bad cause as well as a good one. A consistent fine lady is one whose parties are the most splendid, whose dresses are made by the most fashionable modist, whose bonnets are the perfection of elegance, whose manners are as regulated as her watch, to suit all times and occasions, and who pays her bills or not, just as suits her convenience. A consistent politician goes all lengths with party, right or wrong, even though the measures of his party tend to the destruction of his country. In these cases unity of purpose produces consistency. It therefore becomes of the utmost consequence to ascertain what is your aim. The question here is, not what you know, or what you are; but what you intend to be. The passionate lover of science climbs the fearful precipice, and perils life itself for a single little flower belonging to a genus that is wanting in his herbarium. What efforts should be deemed too great to attain each flower of beauty that adorns the garland of woman's worth?

CHEERFULNESS.

It is the peculiar duty of woman to maintain a cheerful heart. Protected from the trials and cares to which the other sex are exposed, to her they turn for comfort and consolation. And nobly does she afford it in the time of darkness and affliction; but too often, in apparent prosperity, instead of cheering those who are annoyed with a thousand nameless vexations, she adds to their perplexities and cares. How lovely does she appear to whom all in the domestic circle turn for sympathy in their joy, and who, with winning kindness, beguiles them from their sorrow. The little one, tottering on the floor, clears his discontented face and breaks into a merry laugh as he catches the reflection of her sweet smile. The poor, too, pray that God may bless her whose presence is ever to them such a rich blessing. Cherish, then, in the spring-time of life, that cheerfulness which is the “bloom and effluence” of Christianity, and its fragrance shall be shed around your declining years, and linger, when the spirit is fled, in a sweet smile over the face that even in death it can make lovely.

SELF-GOVERNMENT.

Self-government is, of course, a much more difficult task for the irritable, the passionate, the sanguine, than for the naturally amiable. The disposition which a happy few possess resembles the climate of some sweet island of the Pacific Ocean, where no violent storms ever agitate the mild and uniform temperature; while others are like our own Indies, where the hurricane and tornado are frequent visitants. If you possess an equable flow of animal spirits it is impossible for you to conceive of the difficulty of restraining and controlling an impetuous, impulsive temperament. The Apostles St. John and St. Paul exemplified this natural difference in temperament. The beloved disciple possessed an angelic sweetness of disposition, a kindliness, and a beautiful equanimity, which rendered him the soothing, gentle friend, upon whose bosom the Saviour could lean at the social board.

V.

VICTORIA I.,

REIGNING Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, was born at Kensington Palace, May 24th, 1819. Her father was Edward Duke of Kent, fourth son of George III., and her mother* was Victoria Maria Louisa, daughter of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg. Left a widow when her delicate infant was but eight months old, the Duchess of Kent devoted herself to the great purpose of training her daughter to be worthy of the crown which it seemed probable she might wear. Queen Victoria is, therefore, the exponent of female nature rightly cultivated for the highest station a mortal can inherit by birth. The means by which this instruction was perfected and the results to humanity, are studies for the statesman, philosopher, and Christian.

In our brief sketch we shall only allude to some of the seemingly small circumstances, yet really great events, because influencing a mind which was to have a vast influence on other minds.

The ordering and training of Queen Victoria was entirely the work of her wise-hearted mother, and chiefly accomplished by female agencies. That her education was of the highest and most perfect order for her station, there are ample proofs; it has given to the greatest monarchy in the world the best sovereign the world contains; the best of her own royal line; the best, morally speaking, that ever sat on England's throne. More than this, Victoria was trained to perform all her duties; she is an accomplished lady, as perfect in her feminine as in her queenly character; a dutiful daughter, a loving wife, a watchful mother, a kind mistress, a generous benefactor, an exemplary Christian; there are no startling contrasts nor weak inconsistencies in her conduct. Such uniform adherence to the right and proper under circumstances where selfish propensities are so often stimulated and so easily gratified, must be the result of the conscientious principle early and unceasingly cultivated. In this lies the germ of all moral goodness and the elements of all true greatness. From Conscientiousness enlightened by the Divine precepts are educes the virtues of obedience, temperance, truth, justice, mercy, prudence, fidelity, benevolence, and self-control; while the sweet feelings of love, hope, and faith, whose union and exaltation form the crowning grace of piety, owe their best and holiest charm to the same principle of right. Let us see how the teachings of the mother could thus lead her child in the way of righteousness whose end is always happiness, either in this world or in the better one to come.

Before the birth of this precious child, the Duchess of Kent had shown, in the previous circumstances of her life, and particularly in the personal sacrifices and risks she endured when, leaving her own home in Germany, she hastened to England so that her offspring might be British born, her deep devotion to duty, and that innate wisdom which has guided her through every task and trial. Perhaps nothing at the time more strikingly marked the moral delicacy of the woman and the decision of character so necessary to sustain it, than the resolution she evinced to trust herself to the care of the midwife whom she had summoned from Germany to attend her.

In spite of the remonstrances of those who fancied scientific knowledge was confined to masculine practitioners, the Duchess of Kent was firm in her purpose to employ only Dr. Charlotte,* as she was called; and thus, under a woman's care and skill, Victoria was ushered into the world. The Duchess of Kent nursed her infant at her own bosom, always attended on the bathing and dressing, and, as soon as the little girl could sit alone, she was placed at a small table beside her mother's at her meals, yet never indulged in any but the prescribed simple kinds of food. Thus were the sentiments of obedience, temperance, and self-control early inculcated and brought into daily exercise.

The Duke of Kent died in debt for money borrowed of his friends. The Duchess instructed the little Princess concerning these debts, and encouraged her to lay aside portions of money, which might have been expended in the purchase of toys, as a fund to pay these demands against her deceased father. Thus were awakened and cultivated those noble virtues, justice, fortitude, fidelity, prudence, with that filial devotion which is the germ of patriotism. And thus, throughout all the arrangements during the first seven years, the order, the simplicity, the conscientiousness of the teacher, were moulding the ductile and impressive mind and heart of the pupil to follow after wisdom and do the right. Love, in her mother's form, was ever around the little Princess; the counsels and examples of that faithful Mentor, like an inspiration, served to lift up the young soul to have hope in God and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ.

* This female physician was a regular graduate from a medical college in Germany, where such midwives only, or chiefly, are employed by women of all ranks. "The Duchess of Kent adhered to the modest and praiseworthy custom of the old Teutonic nations, and confided herself to Dr. Charlotte," says an English writer. Would that this "modest and praiseworthy custom" might be prepared for and followed every where. Female physicians should be educated to take charge of their own sex and of children; then the public health would really improve, because the founders of those habits which ensure health would become enlightened. The employment of men as midwives is unscriptural and unnatural; an insult to the female mind and an outrage on female delicacy.

Well was it that the Duke of Kent left his wife sole guardian over their child. The Duchess could arrange the whole manner of Victoria's education and superintend it. She did do this. From the day of her husband's death till Victoria was proclaimed Queen, the Duchess of Kent never separated herself from her daughter. They slept in the same apartment; the first lessons were given by maternal lips, and when careful teachers were employed, still the mother was ever present, sharing the amusements and encouraging the exercises and innocent gaiety of the child. Thus was Victoria trained. Her intellectual education was as thorough as her physical and moral. From her cradle she was taught to speak three languages—English, German, and French. In her fifth year her mother chose as preceptor for the Princess the Rev. George Davys; now, through the gratitude of his pupil, Bishop of Peterborough. In the cooperation afforded by this gentleman with the wise plans of the Duchess for her daughter's instruction, he evinced great excellence of moral character, and his faithfulness was well rewarded. The Duchess confided in him fully. When the Princess became heir presumptive to the throne, and it was intimated to her mother that some distinguished prelate should be appointed instructor, and Earl Grey named the Bishop of Lincoln, then was the conscientious and truly noble mind of the Duchess displayed. She expressed her perfect approval of Dr. Davys as her daughter's tutor, declined any change, but hinted that if a dignified clergyman were indispensable to fill this important office, there would be no objection if Dr. Davys received the preferment he had always well merited. He was soon afterwards made Dean of Chester. Such traits deserve notice, because illustrative of the good influences which surrounded the young Princess, and also because they exhibit the constancy of woman's esteem when gained by worthy conduct.

Besides her preceptor, Victoria had an excellent instructress, the Baroness Lehzen, whose services were likewise retained through the whole term of her education; and the long harmony so happily maintained between the mother and her auxiliaries in this important work of preparing a sovereign to be worthy of a throne, is an example worth consideration by those who would seek the best models for private education.

It has been stated repeatedly and never contradicted, that the Princess Victoria was not aware of her claims on the succession until a little before the death of her uncle, George IV. The Duchess had thus carefully guarded her child from the pernicious flattery of inferiors, and kept her young heart free from hopes or wishes which the future might have disappointed. When the accession of King William placed her next the throne, she had completed her eleventh year, "and evinced abilities and possessed accomplishments very rare for that tender age in any rank of life," says an English author. "She spoke French and German with fluency, and was acquainted with Italian; she had made some progress in Latin, being able to read Virgil and Horace with ease; she had commenced Greek and studied Mathematics, and evinced peculiar aptness for that science of reality; indeed, in all the sciences connected with numbers the royal pupil showed great skill and powers of reason." She had also made good proficiency in music and drawing; in both of which arts she afterwards became quite accomplished. Thus happily engaged in acquiring knowledge of every kind necessary for her royal station, among which the knowledge of the people was not neglected, nor the arts, sciences, and employments which most conduce to the prosperity and advancement of a nation, this young Princess passed the intervening years till her majority, May 24th, 1837. The day was kept as a general holiday throughout the kingdom. The city of London voted addresses of congratulation to the Princess Victoria and Duchess of Kent on that occasion, which we notice in order to give a few sentiments from the reply of the Duchess; she said: "The Princess has arrived at that age which now justifies me in expressing my confident expectation that she will be found competent to execute the sacred trust which may be reposed in her; for, communicating as she does with all classes of society, she cannot but perceive that the greater the diffusion of religious knowledge and the love of freedom in a country, the more orderly, industrious, and wealthy is its population; and that, with the desire to preserve the constitutional prerogatives of the crown, ought to be coordinate with the protection of the liberties of the people."

In four weeks from that day the sudden death of William IV. gave the sovereignty of the British empire to this young maiden of eighteen. Beautifully has she fulfilled the expectations of her mother and the hopes of the nation. The manner in which the Duchess relinquished her power over her daughter was a fitting sequel to the faithfulness with which she had exercised it. The great officers of state and privy counsellors, a hundred or more of the noblest in the land, assembled on the morning of June 20th, at Kensington Palace. They were ushered into the grand saloon. Soon Victoria appeared, accompanied by her mother and the officers of her household. After the Duchess had seen her royal daughter enthroned on a seat of state prepared for the occasion, she withdrew and left the young Queen with her council. From that hour the Duchess treated her august daughter with the respectful observance her station, according to court etiquette, demands. No more advice, no farther instructions, not even suggestions, were ever offered. Doubtless, if the Queen seeks her mother's counsel in private it is always given in love and truth; but the good seed had been sown at the right time; it put forth, by the blessing of God, spontaneously. The soul, like the soil, must bear its own harvest.

On the 17th of July, 1837, the young Queen made her first public appearance as sovereign over her realm; she prorogued Parliament in person; never was the act done more royally.

On the 28th of June, 1838, she was crowned in Westminster Abbey. Never were the long and tedious ceremonies more gracefully endured. From that time onward there has been no diminution in her zeal; every duty devolving on her, every form prescribed, every custom held important in the old and cumbrous British government, Victoria I. has performed, observed, and cherished. She has been the model of female royalty. But this is a trifling matter, compared with the salutary influence her high principles, refined taste, and graceful propriety of manners have wielded over those who give the tone to fashionable society in England. Vice and folly retire abashed from her presence.

Great Britain is governed by laws, but the ruler is not amenable to these laws. Hence the importance that the sovereign should show obedience to the laws of God, from which the morality of all Christian codes is educed. With wickedness on the throne, pollution in the palace, infidelity at the head of the church, how can the nation increase in piety, virtue, and goodness? The great blessing of a female reign* is in its purity of court-morals and its decorum of manners. These strengthen the religious elements of human nature and give soul the supremacy over sense.

This example of strict virtue on the British throne was imperatively needed; hence the great blessing conferred by the reign of Victoria, who is, in her private life, a model for her people. She was married on the 10th of February, 1840, to her cousin, Prince Albert, of Saxe-Coburg, who had been, for a time, her associate in childhood, and whose development of character and talents has fully justified the wisdom of her choice and the worth of her influence. The union was one of mutual affection, and has been remarkably happy and fortunate. The royal pair have already seven children--Victoria Adelaide, Princess Royal, born Nov. 21, 1840; Albert Edward, Prince of Wales, born Nov. 9, 1841; Alice Maud Mary, born April 25, 1843; Alfred Ernest, born August 6, 1844; Helena Augusta, born May 5, 1846; Louisa Caroline, born March 5, 1848; Arthur Patrick, born May 1, 1850. All these children are carefully trained under the supervision of their royal parents, and the family of the Queen is one of the best governed and guided in England.

We might record royal journeys by sea and land more extensive than any made since the Revolution; these are only of importance to our purpose as showing the activity of Victoria's mind and the wise economy with which all her private affairs are managed. She finds time for all she wishes to do, and the means from her allowed income. She is never in debt. She is liberal in her charities, and, from her private purse, has pensioned many deserving persons, including a number of the literary ladies of England. Compare Victoria's character and conduct since she came to the throne with the best sovereign of her royal line. The Georges I. and II. were hardly above the brutes; we would not bring this excellent Queen into comparison with such men. Nor with George IV., the profligate sensualist, who disgraced the title of "gentleman;" nor with William IV., of whom, on his accession, John Foster pithily remarks, "It is to be hoped he is better than the last, and there could not well be cheaper praise."

But we will take him who has been vaunted as the good king, George III. He was narrow-minded, cruel, and selfish. It is notorious that he delighted in signing death-warrants, and never would grant a pardon to the condemned unless driven by the greatest importunities. Victoria pardons even against the remonstrances of her advisers; and so painful to her is the signature of her name to the death-penalty that she has been relieved from the duty, though the delight of the pardoning power she holds firmly. Of the manner in which their respective sentiments of honour and honesty contrast, the following, from the pen of an English gentleman, will testify. "Frederick, Prince of Wales, father of George III., died considerably in debt, of which his son, rich as he was, never paid a single farthing. So much for George III. as a son; let us look at him as a FATHER. No sooner was George, Prince of Wales, (afterwards George IV.) born, than his father laid hands on the Duchy of Cornwall and all other property to which the son was entitled, appropriated the rents and profits thereof to his own use, and never accounted to the latter for any part of them whatever, (as he was bound to do on the son's coming of age,) but sent the son to Parliament for the payment of his debts!

How different the conduct of VICTORIA!

With an income of not much more than half the amount of that possessed by her grandfather, George III., her almost first act on coming to the throne, was to pay her father's (the Duke of Kent's) debts out of her own privy purse; and on the birth of her son, (the Prince of Wales,) she had his Duchy and other property put into the hands of responsible commissioners to be protected and made the most of for him till he was of age."

It is impossible to study carefully the manifestations of character in the sexes, without seeing on every side proofs of the superior moral endowments of the female. Woman is the conservator of truth and purity; the first teacher and best exemplar of the Christian virtues. When God, by whom "kings reign," exalts a woman to the government of a great kingdom, we are led to believe it is for the purpose of promoting the best interests of virtue, religion, and social happiness. There was never a time when moral power might be so effectually and gloriously employed as at the present. The empire of physical force is crumbling into ruins. It is fitting that the reign of feeling and intellect, of industry and peace, should be ushered in by a woman.

* Queens have excelled kings in the administration of civil government not from superior powers of reason, but from a clearer moral sense. Isabella I. was the greatest and noblest ruler who has governed Spain, because she faithfully sought to do right. Theresa Maria, with a very limited education, was the wisest and best ruler who has held sway over the Germanic Empire, because she laboured for the good of those she governed; not for her own sensual indulgences. Elizabeth was the most able ruler of men and the most watchful for the welfare of her subjects who has ever filled the British throne, because she governed as the mother, not as the oppressor, of her people; holding the power for good or evil which the sovereign does not now possess. Compare the glories and prosperity of her reign with that which preceded and that which followed. No wonder the British people rejoice when the sceptre passes into the hands of a woman!

The last great pageant in which Queen Victoria has performed her part so admirably, was the opening of the "World's Fair," at the Crystal Palace, London; May the 1st, 1851. Leaning on the arm of her beloved and revered husband, Prince Albert, who had originated this wonderful and most successful enterprise of bringing together into London the world's work and wealth, the Queen, leading their princely son while the husband led their royal daughter, appeared before the vast assemblage of men from all nations as one who had the "monarch power," yet sweetly modified by the character of wife and mother. She came to give publicly her sympathy and her approval to a great movement whose influence on the happiness of the world, will, probably, be more important than any which has taken place since the Reformation. The opening of the great Industrial Exhibition was an act worthy of a Queen; worthy of Victoria I.

W.

WEBER, HELENE MARIE,

Is the only child of Major Frederick Weber, a native of Berlin, and at one time an officer of note in the Prussian service. Mrs. Weber, who is yet living, was an Englishwoman of great beauty and fortune, daughter of a Liverpool merchant named Hastings. They were married in Paris in 1824, and Helene was born in that city in 1825. Major Weber died the next year. After his death, Mrs. Weber went with her child to England; where she resided until 1837, when she removed to Brussels to facilitate Helene's education; and in 1843 she gave Helene an opportunity of acquiring a thorough knowledge of German by a residence in Leipzig. Miss Weber is not only thoroughly educated in all the usual branches studied by women, but is a proficient in several of the more abstruse sciences; such as chemistry, geology, mineralogy, mathematics, political economy, &c. A celebrated French critic, opposed to the course in which she is engaged, acknowledges that "Miss Weber possesses the highest order of intellect, and a thorough knowledge of social and political economy."

It was while she was living in Leipzig that she began to take an interest in the cause of woman's rights; and her earliest papers on the subject were published in a periodical of that city. They excited a great deal of notice at the time. Their success induced her to undertake a series of tracts covering the whole ground of "Woman's Rights and Wrongs." The first of these was published at Leipzig in 1844, and during the next year it was succeeded by nine others; each bearing a second title and confined to one subject. The following synopsis of this series may be acceptable.

1. "Intellectual Faculties" argues that women are intellectually equal to men. Man is superior in profundity of mind — woman in quick perceptions and brilliant fancies. Uneducated women are more apt and intelligent than uneducated men. Girls are trained too delicately to allow the mind to expand.

2. "Rights of Property." The property of a woman should not fall to her husband by marriage. She ought to hold it independent of him, but it ought to be liable for debts contracted by her, even in her husband's name, and for actual family expenses, under a judicious discrimination of items. The husband not to be held for debts contracted by the wife, except family expenses, as named previously.

3. "Wedlock." The wife not to lose her civil existence by marrying. Actions in law against the wife to be prosecuted against her irrespective of the husband, and the latter not to be held for any pecuniary penalty imposed on her. Marriages ought not to be hastily contracted, and divorces seldom or never granted.

4. "Politics." Women ought to enjoy an equal right with men to political stations, being capable to an equal degree.

5. "Ecclesiastics." Women are capable of being, efficient ministers of the gospel. It is a calling for which they are eminently suited — even better than men.

6. "Rights of Suffrage." Woman ought to vote at all the ballotings: she ought not only to have the right, but should ever exercise it.

7. "Dress." Distinction in the dress of the sexes ought to be abolished, and each person to dress as he or she prefers. She advises male attire for single women, and for married women on some occasions. She proves the propriety of this dress by ingenious arguments, and maintains that it does not conflict with the Mosaic law.

8. "Vocation." Agriculture is the most suitable employment for women of adequate means. It is noble, respectable, and replete with pleasure. Attending shops and indoor mechanical pursuits are fit vocations for the sex. Industry is one of the first virtues; every woman should produce by honest labour at least as much as she consumes.

9. "Ultraism." Fanatical reformers do great harm to the cause. Over-zeal is worse to a cause than downright opposition. Hitherto there have been too many lines of distinction between the two sexes. Many of these have been eradicated; some still remain, because they are natural lines, such as man cannot interfere with; and all attempts to break down all the lines of distinction are futile and fraught with evil to the cause. All organized bodies are detrimental to the advancement of woman's rights. Under the shelter of an aggregate mass, opinions are promulgated which mere individuals would not avow. The work of reform must advance without hot-bed aid.

10. "Prudery." The timidity and squeamishness of many women keep the work back. This is better than ultraism, but is yet a serious evil. The duty of woman is pointed out—to secure her rights and to retain what she gains.

These brief outlines will give you an idea of the character of the tracts. Miss Weber is not ultra herself, except in regard to dress. The essays are written with singular vigour, interspersed with wit and humour. They have been widely circulated, and have done more good, perhaps, than the efforts of all the female reformers united. Her reasoning is close and perspicuous, and rarely fails to convince. These books are in pamphlet form of from ninety-six to one hundred and forty-four pages each. They were issued without the writer's name—not even an initial. The name was discovered, however, before the fifth number appeared, and Miss Weber became famous. The learned and the noble sought her acquaintance. This was the period at which she assumed male attire; being then nineteen years old.

In the spring of 1845 Miss Weber came in possession of a handsome legacy, left her by an aunt in Berlin. She then bought the farm on which she now lives, fifteen miles from Brussels, called by her "La Pelouse." It was in wretched condition, but she went energetically to work and soon put it in order; built a new house, repaired the stables and outhouses, laid out gardens and ornamented grounds, and gave the whole place an appearance of thrift and prosperity. Besides an object of occupation and interest, she has made her farm a source of profit. She oversees and directs every thing in person, keeps farm-books, and conducts her operations with system. Her family, besides herself, consists of her mother, two young girls, (her cousins,) and three servants. The working people live in cottages on the farm.

Miss Weber has a fine, but rather masculine form. She is tall and well-proportioned, and in male attire, her favourite dress, she appears like an elegant young gentleman. Her hair is cut short; she generally wears a black dress-coat and pantaloons; sometimes a stylish blue dress-coat with superb plain gilt buttons and drab tights. She always wears a buff cassimere vest, trimmed with plain but highly polished gold buttons, and she uses very little jewelry. Her face is womanly and beautiful; her manners are ladylike and easy, and no one would suppose that she was conscious of appearing in a dress differing from most of her sex. Her conversation is full of vigour, animation, and sincerity, enlivened by a natural turn for wit and humour, but marked by the most refined womanly delicacy, and a true feminine consideration for the feelings of others. She numbers among her friends the great and good of both sexes.

Miss Weber is a pious and consistent church-woman. All her books breathe a true Christian spirit. In 1844 she published in Leipzig a small volume of religious poems, descriptive of the finest passages of Scripture. This volume was well received, and gained for her the favour and personal friendship of the religious community. Besides these, she has written extensively in prose and verse for periodicals, and has delivered lectures in several of the larger German cities, as Berlin, Vienna, &c., before societies organized on her own principles, to further the cause of reform; yet, as has been observed before, except in the matter of dress, she is remarkably free from those ultra notions which prevail so extensively in France. At present, Miss Weber is engaged in preparing a book on "Agriculture as an Employment for Women."

We have given the foregoing sketch as communicated by a lady who visited and admired Miss Weber; nor do we doubt her claims to admiration. She has a good degree of prudence united with talents of a brilliant order; but we do question the utility of her theories and the truth of her reasoning. That she seems to adhere to the Christian religion and expresses her belief in the Bible, makes what is repugnant to the spirit of its holy doctrines more mischievous than would be her avowed infidelity. Therefore we cannot send forth the record of her opinions and doings without a few words of warning to our young countrywomen.

One of Miss Weber's strongest arguments in favour of male costume is, that nature has made sufficient differences in the personal appearance of the sexes; therefore they should dress alike. But is this true philosophy? If nature has made differences, ought not art to follow the intimation of nature or Providence, and make the mode of dress appropriate to these differences?

But more fallacious are her ideas respecting employments. If women devote themselves to agriculture, who shall manage the household and train the children? Miss Weber has inherited a fortune. She does not labour with her hands, nor does she employ female labourers to any extent. If women earn their own support, men will have more time and money to spend on their own selfish gratifications. It is the necessity of doing what the Apostle commands every Christian man to do—"provide for his own household"—which keeps many from sin and ruin. This doctrine, which is inciting women to compete with men in industrial arts and become independent of the care and protection of the stronger sex, is most dangerous in its influence, and would, if it were acted out, (which it will never be,) destroy all hope of Christian progress.

WELBY, AMELIA B.

WHOSE maiden name was Coppuck, was born in St. Michael's, Maryland, in 1821. About 1835, her father removed to Louisville, Kentucky, where, three years afterwards, she was married to Mr. George B. Welby, a merchant of that city. Mrs. Welby began to write at a very early age, and, when scarcely more than a girl, her poems, which were published under the nom de plume of Amelia, in the Louisville Journal, had gained for her no small degree of fame, as one of the most promising of our numerous band of young writers. Without displaying any marked or peculiar traits of genius, her writings possess a finish and graceful ease; they show true and warm womanly feelings, a refined delicacy, and an eye to perceive, together with a mind that can appreciate the lovely and beautiful in spirit, as well as in nature. They are evidently not mere imitations of some favourite writer, but have a character and style of their own, which has probably contributed much to their popularity. In 1844, a collection of her poems was published in Boston, which met with unusual success for that class of writings, going through no less than four large editions in four years. In 1850, a larger collection of her writings was published by the Appletons of New York, in a volume beautifully illustrated.

From "Poems."

MY SISTERS.

Like flowers that softly bloom together,
Upon one fair and fragile stem,
Mingling their sweets in sunny weather
Ere strange, rude hands have parted them,

So were we lured unto each other,
Sweet sisters, in our childish hours,
For then one fond and gentle mother
To us was like the stem to flowers;
She was the golden thread that bound us
In one bright chain together here,
Till Death unlocked the cord around us,
And we were severed far and near.

The floweret's stem, when broke or shattered,
Must cast its blossoms to the wind,
Yet, round the buds, though widely scattered,
The same soft perfume still we find;
And thus, although the tie is broken
That linked us round our mother's knee,
The memory of words we've spoken,
When we were children light and free,
Will, like the perfume of each blossom,
Live in our hearts where'er we roam,
As when we slept on one fond bosom,
And dwelt within one happy home.

I know that changes have come o'er us;
Sweet sisters! we are not the same,
For different paths now lie before us,
And all three have a different name;
And yet, if Sorrow's dimming fingers
Have shadowed o'er each youthful brow
So much of light around them lingers
I can not trace those shadows now.
Ye both have those who love ye only,
Whose dearest hopes are round you thrown.
While, like a stream that wanders lonely,
Am I, the youngest, wildest one.

My heart is like the wind, that beareth
Sweet scents upon its unseen wing —
The wind! that for no creature careth,
Yet stealeth sweets from everything,
It hath rich thoughts for ever leaping
Up, like the waves of flashing seas,
That with their music still are keeping
Soft time with every fitful breeze;
Each leaf that in the bright air quivers,
The sounds from hidden solitudes,
And the deep flow of far-off rivers,
And the loud rush of many fountains:

All these, and more, stir in my bosom
Feelings that make my spirit glad,
Like dewdrops shaken in a blossom;
And yet there is a something sad
Mixed with those thoughts, like clouds, that hover
Above us in the quiet air,
Veiling the moon's pale beauty over
Like a dark spirit brooding there.
But, sisters! those wild thoughts were never
Yours: ye would not love, like me,
To gaze upon the stars for ever,
To hear the wind's wild melody.

Ye'd rather look on smiling faces,
And linger round a cheerful hearth,
Than mark the stars' bright hiding-places
As they peep out upon the earth.
But, sisters! as the stars of even
Shrink from Day's golden-flashing eye,
And, melting in the depths of heaven,
Veil their soft beams within the sky;
So shall we pass, the joyous-hearted,
The fond, the young, like stars that wane
Till every link of earth be parted,
To form in heaven one mystic chain.

TO A SEA-SHELL.

Shell of the bright sea-waves!
What is it that we hear in thy sad moan?
Is this unceasing music all thine own?
Late of the ocean-caves!

Or does some spirit dwell
In the deep windings of thy chambers dim,
Breathing for ever, in its mournful hymn,
Of ocean's anthem-swell?

Wert thou a murmurer long
In crystal palaces beneath the seas,
Ere from the blue sky thou hadst heard the breeze
Pour its ful' tide of song?

Another thing with thee:
Are there not gorgeous cities in the deep,
Buried with flashing gems that brightly sleep,
Hid by the mighty sea?

And say, oh lone sea-shell!
Are there not costly things and sweet perfumes
Scattered in waste o'er that sea-gulf of tombs?
Hush thy low moan and tell.

But yet, and more than all —
Has not each foaming wave in fury tossed
O'er earth's most beautiful, the brave, the lost,
Like a dark funeral pall?

'T is vain — thou answerest not!
Thou hast no voice to whisper of the dead;
'T is ours alone, with sighs like odors shed,
To hold them unforget!

Thine is as sad a strain
As if the spirit in thy hidden cell
Pined to be with the many things that dwell
In the wild, restless main.

And yet there is no sound
Upon the waters, whispered by the waves,
But seemeth like a wail from many graves,
Thrilling the air around.

The earth, oh moaning shell!
The earth hath melodies more sweet than these —
The music-gush of rills, the hum of bees
Heard in each blossom's bell.

Are not these tones of earth,
The rustling forest, with its shivering leaves,
Sweeter than sounds that e'en in moonlit eves
Upon the seas have birth?

Alas! thou still wilt moan —
Thou'rt like the heart that wastes itself in sighs
E'en when amid bewildering melodies,
If parted from its own.

THE OLD MAID.

Why sits she thus in solitude? her heart
Seems melting in her eye's delicious blue —
And as it heaves, her ripe lips lie apart
As if to let its heavy throbbings through;
In her dark eye a depth of softness swells,
Deeper than that her careless girlhood wore;
And her cheek crimson with the hue that tells
The rich, fair fruit is ripened to the core.

It is her thirtieth birthday! with a sigh
Her soul hath turn'd from youth's luxuriant bowers,
And her heart taken up the last sweet tie
That measured out its links of golden hours!
She feels her inmost soul within her stir
With thoughts too wild and passionate to speak;
Yet her full heart — its own interpreter —
Translates itself in silence on her cheek.

Joy's opening buds, affection's glowing flowers,
Once lightly sprang within her beaming track:
Oh, life was beautiful in those lost hours,
And yet she does not wish to wander back!
No! she but loves in loneliness to think
On pleasures past, though never more to be:
Hope links her to the future — but the link
That binds her to the past is memory!

From her lone path she never turns aside,
Though passionate worshippers before her fall;
Like some pure planet in her lonely pride,
She seems to soar and beam above them all!
Not that her heart is cold! — emotions new
And fresh as flowers are with her heartstrings knit:
And sweetly mournful pleasures wander through
Her virgin soul, and softly ruffle it.

For she hath lived with heart and soul alive
To all that makes life beautiful and fair;
Sweet Thoughts, like honey-bees, have made their hive
Of her soft bosom-cell, and cluster there;
Yet life is not to her what it hath been:
Her soul hath learned to look beyond its gloss —
And now she hovers like a star between
Her deeds of love — her Saviour on the cross!

Beneath the cares of earth she does not bow,
Though she hath oftentimes drained its bitter cup,
But ever wanders on with heavenward brow,
And eyes whose lovely lids are lifted up!
She feels that in that lovelier, happier sphere,
Her bosom yet will, birdlike, find its mate,
And all the joys it found so blissful here
Within that spirit-realm perpetuate.

Yet, sometimes o'er her trembling heartstrings thrum
Soft sighs, for raptures it hath ne'er enjoyed —
And then she dreams of love, and strives to fill
With wild and passionate thoughts the craving void
And thus she wanders on — half sad, half blest —
Without a mate for the pure, lonely heart,
That, yearning, throbs within her virgin breast
Never to find its lovely counterpart!

THE RAINBOW.

I sometimes have thoughts, in my loneliest hours,
That lie on my heart like the dew on the flowers,
Of a ramble I took one bright afternoon,
When my heart was as light as a blossom in June;
The green earth was moist with the late fall'n showers,
The breeze flutter'd down and blew open the flowers,
While a single white cloud, to its haven of rest
On the white wing of Peace, floated off in the west.

As I threw back my tresses to catch the cool breeze
That scatter'd the rain-drops and dimpled the seas,
Far up the blue sky a fair rainbow unroll'd
Its soft-tinted pinions of purple and gold.
'T was born in a moment, yet, quick as its birth,
It had stretch'd to the uttermost ends of the earth,
And, fair as an angel, it floated as free,
With a wing on the earth and a wing on the sea

How calm was the ocean! how gentle its swell!
Like a woman's soft bosom it rose and it fell;
While its light sparkling waves, stealing laughingly o'er,
When they saw the fair rainbow, knelt down on the shore
No sweet hymn ascended, no murmur of prayer,
Yet I felt that the spirit of worship was there,
And bent my young head, in devotion and love,
'Neath the form of the angel that floated above.

How wide was the sweep of its beautiful wings!
How boundless its circle, how radiant its rings!
If I look'd on the sky, 't was suspended in air;
If I look'd on the ocean, the rainbow was there;
Thus forming a girdle, as brilliant and whole
As the thoughts of the rainbow that circled my soul.
Like the wing of the Deity, calmly unfurl'd,
It bent from the cloud and encircled the world.

There are moments, I think, when the spirit receives
Whole volumes of thought on its unwritten leaves,
When the folds of the heart in a moment uncloset
Like the innermost leaves from the heart of a rose:
And thus, when the rainbow had pass'd from the sky,
The thoughts it awoke were too deep to pass by;
It left my full soul, like the wing of a dove,
All fluttering with pleasure and fluttering with love.

I know that each moment of rapture or pain
But shortens the links in life's mystical chain;
I know that my form, like that bow from the wave,
Must pass from the earth and lie cold in the grave;
Yet oh! when death's shadows my bosom encloud,
When I shrink at the thought of the coffin and shroud
May Hope, like the rainbow, my spirit enfold
In her beautiful pinions of purple and gold.

HOPELESS LOVE.

The trembling waves beneath the moonbeams quiver,
 Reflecting back the blue, unclouded skies;
 The stars look down upon the still, bright river,
 And smile to see themselves in paradise;
 Sweet songs are heard to gush in joyous bosoms,
 That lightly throb beneath the greenwood tree,
 And glossy plumes float in amid the blossoms,
 And all around are happy — all but me!

And yet, I come beneath the light, that trembles
 O'er these dim paths, with listless steps to roam,
 For here my bursting heart no more dissembles,
 My sad lips quiver, and the tear-drops come,
 I come once more to list the low-voiced turtle,
 To watch the dreamy waters as they flow,
 And lay me down beneath the fragrant myrtle,
 That drops its blossoms when the west winds blow.

Oh! there is one, on whose sweet face I ponder,
 One angel-being 'mid the beauteous band,
 Who in the evening's hush comes out to wander
 Amid the dark-eyed daughters of the land!
 Her step is lightest where each light foot presses,
 Her song is sweetest 'mid their songs of glee,
 Smiles light her lips, and rosebuds, 'mid her tresses,
 Look lightly up their dark redundancy.

Youth, wealth, and fame are mine: all that entrances
 The youthful heart, on me their charms confer;
 Sweet lips smile on me, too, and melting glances
 Flash up to mine — but not a glance from her!
 Oh, I would give youth, beauty, fame, and splendour,
 My all of bliss, my every hope resign,
 To wake in that young heart one feeling tender —
 To clasp that little hand, and call it mine!

In this sweet solitude the sunny weather
 Hath call'd to life light shapes and fairy-elves,
 The rosebuds lay their crimson lips together,
 And the green leaves are whispering to themselves;
 The clear, faint starlight, on the blue wave flushes,
 And fill'd with odours sweet, the south wind blows,
 The purple clusters load the lilac bushes,
 And fragrant blossoms fringe the apple-boughs.

Yet, I am sick with love and melancholy,
 My locks are heavy with the dropping dew,
 Low murmurs haunt me — murmurs soft and holy,
 And oh, my lips keep murmuring, murmuring too!
 I hate the beauty of these calm, sweet bowers,
 The bird's wild music, and the fountain's fall;
 Oh, I am sick in this lone land of flowers,
 My soul is weary — weary of them all!

Yet had I that sweet face, on which I ponder,
 To bloom for me within this Eden-home,
 That lip to sweetly murmur when I wander,
 That cheek to softly dimple when I come —
 How sweet would glide my days in these lone bowers,
 Far from the world and all its heartless throngs,
 Her fairy feet should only tread on flowers,
 I'd make her home melodious with my songs!

Ah me! such blissful hopes once fill'd my bosom,
 And dreams of fame could then my heart enthral,
 And joy and bliss around me seem'd to blossom;
 But oh, these blissful hopes are blighted — all!
 No smiling angel decks these Eden-bowers,
 No springing footstep echoes mine in glee —
 Oh, I am weary in this land of flowers!
 I sigh — I sigh amid them all — ah me!

THE LAST INTERVIEW.

Here, in this lonely bower, where first I won thee,
 I come, beloved, beneath the moon's pale ray,
 To gaze once more, through struggling tears, upon thee,
 And then to tear my broken heart away;
 I dare not linger near thee as a brother;
 I feel my burning heart would still be thine;
 How could I hope my passionate thoughts to smother,
 While yielding all the sweetness to another,
 That should be mine!

But fate hath will'd it; the decree, too, spoken:
 Now life may lengthen out its weary chain,
 For rest of thee, its loveliest links are broken;
 May we but clasp them all in heaven again!
 Yes, thou wilt there be mine; in yon blue heaven
 There are sweet meetings of the pure and fond,
 Of joys unspeakable to such are given
 When the sweet ties of love that here are riven
 Unite beyond.

A glorious charm from heaven thou dost inherit
 The gift of angels unto thee belongs;
 Then breathe thy love in music, that thy spirit
 May whisper to me, through thine own sweet songs
 And though my coming life may soon resemble
 The desert spots, through which my steps shall pass
 Though round thee then wild worshippers assemble,
 My heart will triumph if thine own but tremble
 Still true to me.

Yet, not when on our bower the light reposes
 In golden glory, wilt thou sigh for me;
 Not when the young bee seeks the crimson roses,
 And the fair sunbeams tremble o'er the sea;
 But when at eve the tender heart grows fonder,
 And the full soul with pensive love is fraught,
 Then with wet lids o'er these sweet paths thou'lt wander,
 And, thrill'd with love, upon my memory ponder
 With tender thought.

And when at times thy birdlike voice entrances
 The listening throng with some enchanting lay
 If I am near thee, let thy heavenly glances
 One gentle message to my heart convey;
 I ask but this — a happier one has taken
 From my lone life the charm that made it dear!
 I ask but this, and promise me, unshaken;
 To me that look of love — but, oh! 'twill waken
 Such raptures here!

And now, farewell! — farewell! I dare not lengthen
 These sweet, sad moments out; to gaze on thee
 Is bliss indeed, yet it but serves to strengthen
 The love that now amounts to agony;
 This is our last farewell — our last fond meeting;
 The world is wide, and we must dwell apart;
 My spirit gives thee, now, its last wild greeting,
 With lip to lip, while pulse to pulse is beating,
 And heart to heart!

Farewell, farewell! Our dream of bliss is over,
 All save the memory of our blighted love;
 I now must yield thee to thy happier lover,
 Yet, oh! remember, thou art mine above!
 'Tis a sweet thought; and when by distance parted,
 'T will lie upon our hearts a holy spell —
 But the sad tears beneath thy lids have started,
 And I — alas! — we both are broken-hearted! — Farewell!

WHITMAN, SARAH HELEN,

Is a native of Providence, Rhode Island. Her maiden name was Power. Her father died when she was a child. Her mother being thus left to the solitariness of a widow's lot, devoted herself with unwearied care to the education of her daughter. The health of Miss Power was constitutionally delicate, while her mental faculties developed with that quickness and brilliancy which surely indicates the predominancy of imagination. Poetry was the favourite literature of her youthful studies, and she soon manifested the propensity, which the Muse will foster in those she elects her votaries, to "write rhyme."

In 1828, Miss Power was married to John W. Whitman, a young lawyer of Boston. The marriage was one of affection, induced by the congeniality of poetical and literary tastes, but the union was in a few years dissolved by the death of Mr. Whitman. Mrs. Whitman then returned to her mother's arms and her early home, at Providence, where she now resides. Her poetry has appeared in the periodicals and annuals over the signature "Helen," and always excited attention by its richness of imagery and sweet, melodious versification. She has an uncommonly retentive memory, and elaborates her poems in a rather peculiar manner; arranging, correcting, and finishing them as compositions perfectly and wholly in her mind, be they ever so long, before committing a line to paper. By this means she has no unfinished performances; those that she does not complete at once are entirely abandoned.

Her published poems have not been numerous; she appears never to have contemplated making a volume, but only allows her thoughts to visit the temple of the muses to gratify her own love of the beautiful and glorious in nature and art. The genius of this amiable woman seems naturally of that delicate presence which shrinks, like the "sensitive plant," from any collision with the actual world; but the sad passages in her life have probably deepened the melancholy pathos of her strains. There appears no affectation in this sensibility; she feels as warm admiration for the beauties and blessings which the beneficent Creator has bestowed on the works and creatures of his hand, as though these awakened none but pleasurable emotions. Still, there is ever in her heart a sensation of sadness, like that so powerfully described by Keats in his "Ode on Melancholy," as if she tasted the bitter ingredient even in the sweetest draught.

TO THE SPIRIT OF POETRY.

Hail! queen of high and holy thought;
Of dreams, with fairy beauty fraught;
Sweet memories of the days gone by;
Glimpses of immortality.
Visions of grandeur, glory, power,
All that in inspiration's hour,
Like sunset's changing glories, roll
Within the poet's raptured soul!

Thy throne is in the crimson fold,
Around the setting day-star roll'd;
Thou walkest through the sapphire sky,
When the bright moon is sailing high,
Touching the stars with purer light,
And lending holier charms to night;
The clouds a deeper glory wear,
The winds a softer music bear,
And earth is heaven, when thou art there

There's not a murmur on the breeze,
Nor ripple on the dark, blue seas,
Nor breath of violets, faintly sweet,
Nor glittering dew-drop at our feet,
Nor tinge of mellow radiance, where
Soft moonbeams melt along the air;
Nor shade nor tint, on flower or tree,
But takes a softer grace from thee.

And love itself—the brightest gem
In all creation's diadem—
Oh! what were mortal love, didst thou
Not lend a glory to his brow?
Degraded, though of heavenly birth,
And sullied with the cares of earth;
Wasted and worn by doubts and fears,
Its youthful smiles soon change to tears;
But at thy spirit-stirring breath,
It burst the bonds of sin and death;
And, robed in heavenly charms by thee,
It puts on immortality.

THE WAKING OF THE HEART.

"Pleasure sits in the flower cups, and breathes itself out in fragrance."—Rachel.

As the fabled stone into music woke
When the morning sun o'er the marble broke,
So wakes the heart from its stern repose:
As o'er brow and bosom the spring wind blows.
So it stirs and trembles as each low sigh
Of the breezy south comes murmuring by—
Murmuring by like a voice of love, wooing us forth amid flowers to rove,
Breathing of meadow-paths thickly sown
With pearls from the blossoming fruit tree blown.
And of banks that slope to the southern sky
Where languid violets love to lie.

No foliage droops o'er the woodpath now,
No dark vines swinging from bough to bough;
But a trembling shadow of silvery green
Falls through the young leaf's tender screen,
Like the hue that borders the snowdrop's bell,
Or lines the lid of an Indian shell;
And a fairy light, like the firefly's glow,
Flickers and fades on the grass below.

There the pale Anemone lifts her eye
To look at the clouds as they wander by,
Or lurks in the shade of a palmy fern
To gather fresh dew in her waxen urn.
Where the moss lies thick on the brown earth's breast,
The shy little Mayflower weaves her nest,
But the south wind sighs o'er the fragrant loam,
And betrays the path to her woodland home.

Already the green budding birchen spray
Winnows the balm from the brea h of May,
And the aspen thrills to a low, sweet tone
From the reedy bugle of Faunus blown.

In the tangled coppice the dwarf oak weaves
Her fringelike blossoms and crimson leaves;
Theallows their delicate buds unfold
Into downy feathers bedropped with gold;
While, thick as the stars in the midnight sky,
In the dark, wet meadows the cowslips lie.

A love tint flushes the wind-flower's cheek,
Rich melodies gush from the violet's beak,
On the rifts of the rock the wild columbines grow
Their heavy honey-cups bending low—
As a heart which vague, sweet thoughts oppress,
Droops 'neath its burden of happiness.
There the waters drip from their moss-rimmed wells
With a sound like the tinkling of silver bells.

THE MAIDEN'S DREAM.

"Thrice hallowed be that beautiful dawn of love when the maiden's cheek still blushes at the conscious sweetness of her own innocent thoughts."—Jean Paul.

Ask not if she loves, but look
In the blue depths of her eye,
Where the maiden's spirit seems
Tranced in happy dreams to lie

All the blisses of her dream,
All she may not, must not speak,
Read them in her clouded eye,
Read them on her conscious cheek

See that cheek of virgin snow
Damasked with love's rosy bloom;
Mark the lambent thoughts that glow
Mid her blue eye's tender gloom.

As if in a cool, deep well
Veiled by shadows of the night,
Slanting through, a starbeam fell,
Filling all its depths with light.

Something mournful and profound
Saddens all her beauty now,
Weds her dark eye to the ground—
Flings a shadow o'er her brow.

Hath her love-illuminated soul
Raised the veil of coming years—
Read upon life's mystic scroll
Its doom of agony and tears?

Tears of tender sadness fall
From her soft and lovelit eye,
As the night dews heavily
Fall from summer's cloudless sky.

Still she sitteth coyly drooping
Her white lids in virgin pride,
Like a languid lily stooping
Low her folded blooms to hide.

Starting now in soft surprise
From the tangled web of thought,
Lo, her heart a captive lies
In its own sweet fancies caught.

Ah! bethink thee, maiden yet,
Ere to passion's doom betrayed;
Hearts where Love his seal has set,
Sorrow's fiercest pangs invade.

Let that young heart slumber still,
Like a bird within its nest;
Life can ne'er its dreams fulfil —
Love but yield thee long unrest.

Ah! in vain the dovelet tries
To break the web of tender thought —
The little heart a captive lies,
In its own sweet fancies caught.

STANZAS WITH A BRIDAL RING.

The young Moon hides her virgin heart
Within a ring of gold;
So doth this little circlet all
My bosom's love infold,
And tell the tale that from my lips
Seems ever half untold.

Like the rich legend of the east
That never finds a close,
But winds in linked sweetness on
And lengthens as it goes,
Or like this little cycle still
Returneth whence it flows.

And still as in the elfin ring
Where fairies dance by night
Shall the green places of the heart
Be kept for ever bright,
And hope within this magic round
Still blossom in delight.

A SONG OF SPRING.

In April's dim and showery nights
When music melts along the air,
And Memory wakens at the kiss
Of wandering perfumes, faint and rare —

Sweet springtime perfumes, such as won
Proserpina from realms of gloom
To bathe her bright locks in the sun,
Or bind them with the pansy's bloom,

When light winds rift the fragrant bowers
Where orchards shed their floral wreath,
Strewing the turf with starry flowers,
And dropping pearls at every breath;

When all night long the boughs are stirred
With fitful warblings from the nest,
And the heart flutters like a bird
With its sweet passionate unrest —

Oh! then, beloved, I think on thee,
And on that life, so strangely fair,
Ere yet one cloud of memory
Had gathered in hope's golden air

I think on thee and thy lone grave
On the green hillside far away;
I see the wilding flowers that wave
Around thee as the night winds sway:

And still, though only clouds remain
On life's horizon, cold and drear,
The dream of youth returns again
With the sweet promise of the year

I linger till night's waning stars
Have ceased to tremble through the gloom
Till through the orient's cloudy bars
I see the rose of morning bloom!

All flushed and radiant with delight,
It opens through earth's stormy skies,
Divinely beautiful and bright
As on the hills of paradise.

Lo! like a dewdrop on its breast
The morning star of youth and love,
Melting within the rosy east,
Exhales to azure depths above.

My spirit, soaring like a lark,
Would follow on its airy flight,
And, like yon little diamond spark,
Dissolve into the realms of light.

Sweet-missioned star! thy silver beams
Foretell a fairer life to come.
And through the golden gate of dreams
Allure the wandering spirit home.

A STILL DAY IN AUTUMN.

I love to wander through the woodlands hoary
In the soft light of an autumnal day,
When Summer gathers up her robes of glory,
And like a dream of beauty glides away.

How through each loved, familiar path she lingers
Serenely smiling through the golden mist,
Tinting the wild grape with her dewy fingers
Till the cool emerald turns to amethyst:

Kindling the faint stars of the hazel, shining
To light the gloom of Autumn's mouldering halls
With hoary plumes the clematis entwining
Where o'er the rock her withered garland falls.

Warm lights are on the sleepy uplands waning
Beneath soft clouds along the horizon rolled,
Till the slant sunbeams through their fringes raining
Bathe all the hills in melancholy gold.

The moist winds breathe of crisped leaves and flowers
In the damp hollows of the woodland sown,
Mingling the freshness of autumnal showers
With spicy airs from cedarn alleys blown.

Beside the brook and on the umbered meadow,
Where yellow fern-tufts fleck the faded ground,
With folded lids beneath their palmy shadow
The gentian nods in dewy slumbers bound.

Upon those soft, fringed lids the bee sits brooding,
Like a fond lover loath to say farewell,
Or with shut wings, through silken folds intruding,
Creeps near her heart his drowsy tale to tell.

The little birds upon the hillside lonely
Flit noiselessly along from spray to spray,
Silent as a sweet wandering thought that only
Shows its bright wings and softly glides away

The scentless flowers in the warm sunlight dreaming,
Forget to breathe their fulness of delight,
And through the tranced woods soft airs are streaming,
Still as the dewfall of the summer night.

So in my heart a sweet, unwonted feeling,
Stirs like the wind in ocean's hollow shell —
Through all its secret chambers sadly stealing,
Yet finds no word its mystic charm to tell.

RETROSPECTION.

My heart is in my childhood's home,
And by the far-off sunny braes,
Where, musing, once I loved to roam,
In early youth's romantic days.

The past — the past — the dreamy past,
Called up by memory's magic wand,
Gleams through the halo round it cast
Bright as e'en hope's own phantom land.

Oh never more in after life
Can hope itself such dreams impart
As then, with breathing beauty rife,
Wreathed their soft spells around my heart.

The skies were brighter then than now,
More bland the wandering breezes blew.
The birds sang sweeter on the bough,
The wild flowers wore a richer hue.

Ideal forms of classic lore,
By moss-grown grot and crystal well,
Seemed still to linger as of yore,
And fairies danced in every dell.

Blither than Elf-land's fabled queen,
I loved the green and laughing earth;
While wooded cliff and wild ravine,
Were echoing to my bosom's mirth.

For care had never dimmed my brow,
Nor friends proved heartless and untrue,
I ne'er had wept love's broken vow,
Nor aught of life's dark changes knew.

Farewell, sweet scenes of past delight!
Slowly ye sink from memory's gaze,
Still beaming with reflected light
As bathed in twilight's parting rays.

I wander on my weary way,
Unmindful where my lot is cast,
Since wheresoe'er my footsteps stray,
They cannot lead me to the past.

WILLARD, EMMA,

DISTINGUISHED both as a teacher and writer, has for many years held a prominent position among those who encourage and aid American literature and moral improvement.

* Mrs. Willard is the daughter of the late Sam-

* For this graphic notice we are chiefly indebted to a work - American Biographical Sketch Book — by William Hunt.

uel Hart, of Berlin, Connecticut, where she was born in February, 1787. Her father was descended, on the maternal side, from Thomas Hooker, the first minister of Hartford, who is regarded as the founder of the State of Connecticut; he having led the colony across the wilderness from the vicinity of Boston. Her paternal ancestor was Stephen Hart, a deacon of Mr. Hooker's church, and his companion through the wilderness.

The love of teaching appears to have been a ruling passion in Miss Hart's mind, and was developed in her early years. At the age of sixteen she took charge of a district school in her native town. The following year she opened a select school, and in the summer of the next year was placed at the head of the Berlin Academy. During this period, being engaged at home throughout the summer and winter in the capacity of instructress, she managed in the spring and autumn to attend one or other of the two boarding-schools at Hartford.

During the spring of 1807, Miss Hart received invitations to take charge of academies in three different states, and accepted that from Westfield, Massachusetts. She remained there but a few weeks, when, upon a second and more pressing invitation, she went to Middlebury, in Vermont. Here she assumed the charge of a female academy which she retained for two years. The school was liberally patronized, and general satisfaction rewarded the efforts of its preceptress. In 1809, she resigned her academy, and was united in marriage with Dr. John Willard, then marshal of the district of Vermont, and for several years a leader of the republican party of that State.

In 1814, Mrs. Willard was induced to establish a boarding-school at Middlebury, when she formed the determination to effect an important change in female education, by the institution of a class of schools of a higher character than had been established in the country before. She applied herself assiduously to increase her own personal abilities as a teacher, by the diligent study of branches with which she had before been unacquainted. She introduced new studies into her school, and invented new methods of teaching. She also prepared "An Address to the Public," in which she proposed "A Plan for Improving Female Education."

General Van Schoonhoven, on inspecting the "Plan," heartily approved it; and taking a copy, exhibited it to the leading men of Waterford. At their recommendation, a copy was sent to Governor De Witt Clinton. The latter immediately wrote to Mrs. Willard, expressing a most cordial desire that she would remove her institution to the State of New York. He also recommended the subject of her "Plan" in his message to the legislature. The result was, the passage of an act to incorporate the proposed institute at Waterford, and another to give to female academies a share of the literary fund; being, it is believed, the first law ever passed by any legislature with the direct object of improving female education.

During the spring of 1819, Mrs. Willard accordingly removed to Waterford, and opened her school. The higher mathematics were introduced, and the course of study was made sufficiently complete to qualify the pupils for any station in life. The first young lady who was examined publicly in geometry, and perhaps the first instance in the country, was Miss Cramer, since Mrs. Curtis.

In the spring of 1821, difficulties attending the securing of a proper building for the school in Waterford, Mrs. Willard again determined upon a removal. The public-spirited citizens of Troy offered liberal inducements; and in May, 1821, the Troy Female Seminary was opened under flattering auspices, and abundant success crowned her indefatigable exertions. Since that period, the institute has been well known to the public, and the name of Mrs. Willard, for more than a quarter of a century, has been identified with her favourite academy. Dr. Willard died in 1825; Mrs. Willard continued her school till her health was impaired, and in 1830 she visited France. She resided in Paris for several months, and from thence went to England and Scotland, returning in the following year. After her return, she published a volume of her travels, the avails of which, amounting to twelve hundred dollars, were devoted to the cause of female education in Greece. It may be proper to add, that she gave the avails of one or two other publications to the same object.

The plan of the school for the education of native teachers in Greece originated with Mrs. Willard, and was carried forward through many difficulties and some opposition from those whose aid was expected. Often desponding as to the final result of the attempt, Mrs. Willard laboured but the more zealously, and gave largely of her own substance to secure the desired advantages for Greece. The plan was ultimately crowned with success. "The most elevated views," says M. Eichthal, in his excellent work, entitled Les Deux Mondes, "have determined the important attempt of some American ladies of establishing in Athens a Normal school of native teachers; thus improving civilization at its source. Twenty boarders, (pensionnaires), are now receiving a special education for this object; twelve of them, chosen from the different provinces, are placed in the school by the government, which furnishes the expenses of their education; the others are educated at the expense of the American ladies. Mrs. Sigourney, Mrs. Hale, and Mrs. Phelps, were among those who entered warmly into the views of Mrs. Willard, and aided her in carrying them out with their pens and influence."

In 1838, Mrs. Willard resigned the charge of the Troy Seminary, and returned to Hartford, where she revised her celebrated Manual of American History, for the use of schools. The merits of this work, her smaller United States History, and Universal History, have been attested by their very general use in seminaries of education.

Since 1843, she has completed the revision of her historical works, revised her Ancient Geography, and, in compliance with invitations, has written numerous addresses on different occasions, being mostly on educational subjects. Two of these were written by request of the Western Literary Institute and College of Teachers, and were read at annual meetings of the society, at Cincinnati; one in 1841 and the other in 1843. In 1845, by special invitation, she attended the convention of county and town superintendents, held at Syracuse. She was invited to take part in the public debate; declining that honour, the gentlemen of the convention, to the number of about sixty, called on her at her lodgings, where she read to them a prepared address. The principal topic of it was, "that women, now sufficiently educated, should be employed and furnished by the men as committees, charged with the minute cares and supervision of the common schools;" reasoning from the premises that to man it belongs to provide for the children, while upon woman it is incumbent to take the provision, and apply it economically and judiciously. These sentiments were received with decided approbation.

In the fall of the same year, 1845, Mrs. Willard made, with great satisfaction, an educational tour through some of the southern counties of New York; having been specially invited to attend the institutions for the improvement of teachers of the common schools. At Monticello, Binghamton, Owego, Cairo, and Rome, she aided in instructing no less than five hundred teachers of these schools, and, in many cases, her partings with the young female teachers were not without tears.

The inhabitants of the places where she went to instruct teachers, desiring to have a share in her visits, at their request she attended public meetings of both sexes, where she introduced resolutions which were unanimously passed in the several counties, and aided in the debates. The object was, to forward her scheme of giving to the best educated and most able women of the country the charge and supervision of the village schools for little children; especially of those things appertaining to the conveniences of such schools. That the teachers of these schools should be mostly females, is now universally agreed; but, argued she, while the young women can be the teachers, it needs the matrons, acting under the authority of the men, to aid in the supervision.

In the ensuing winter of 1846, Mrs. Willard prepared for the press a work which has given her more fame abroad, and perhaps at home, than any of her other writings. This work, which was published in the ensuing spring, both in New York and London, developed the result of a study which had intensely occupied her at times for fourteen years. Its title is "A Treatise on the Motive Powers which produce the Circulation of the Blood;" and its object is nothing less than to introduce and to establish the fact, that the principal motive power which produces circulation of the blood is not, as has been heretofore supposed, the heart's action, that being only secondary; but that the principal motive power is respiration, operating by animal heat, and producing an effective force at the lungs. Of this work the London Critic thus speaks:

"We have here an instance of a woman undertaking to discuss a subject that has perplexed and baffled the ingenuity of the most distinguished anatomists and physiologists who have considered it, from Hervey down to Paxton; and what is more remarkable, so acquitting herself as to show that she apprehended, as well as the best of them, the difficulties which beset the enquiry; perceived as quickly as they did the errors and incongruities of the theories of previous writers; and lastly, herself propounded an hypothesis to account for the circulation of the blood and the heart's action eminently entitled to the serious attention and examination of all who take an interest in physiological science."

During the spring and summer of 1846, Mrs. Willard made the tour of the southern and western states, visiting every one of them except Texas. In every city she met her former pupils, who gave her a filial welcome. She was received by the principals of schools and those employed in education as an "educationalist;" and as such, was invited to visit and to address schools, where, in many instances, she received public testimonials of consideration.

In addition to the compends of history which she has written, she has invented, for the purpose of teaching and impressing chronology on the mind by the eye, two charts of an entirely original character; one called "The American Chronographic for American History," and the other for "universal history, called the "Temple of Time." In the latter, the course of time from the creation of the world is thrown into perspective, and the parts of this vast subject wrought into unity, and the most distinguished characters which have appeared in the world are set down, each in his own time. This, in the chart, is better arranged for the memory, than would be that of the place of a city on a map of the world.

In 1849, she published "Last Leaves from American History;" containing an interesting account of our Mexican War, and of California.

The poetical compositions of Mrs. Willard are few, and are chiefly comprised in a small volume printed in 1830. The following, written on ship-board, is a gem of its kind. It has been set to music by the celebrated English composer and vocalist, Knight, and is very popular as a sacred song. The sentiment is so appropriate to the scene, that for an evening strain at sea it is unrivalled.

THE OCEAN HYMN.

Rock'd in the cradle of the deep,
I lay me down in peace to sleep;
Secure I rest upon the wave,
For thou, O Lord, hast power to save.
I know thou wouldst not slight my call,
For thou dost mark the sparrow's fall;
And calm and peaceful is my sleep,
Rock'd in the cradle of the deep.

And such the trust that still were mine,
Tho' stormy winds swept o'er the brine,
And tho' the tempest's fiery breath
Roused me from sleep, to wreck and death:
In Ocean's cave, still safe with Thee,
The germ of immortality;
And calm and peaceful is my sleep,
Rock'd in the cradle of the deep.

From "Address on behalf of the Greek Normal School."

Greece has been not only physically but morally wounded. The vile system of the Arabian deceiver has surrounded her on almost every hand. What circumstance could occur so likely to make way for the destruction of that abominable superstition, as to impart dignity,—the elevation of moral and intellectual worth, to women beyond its reach but within its observation? and is it to be expected that they might derive from American women as well as from any other the frame work of such a character? If this can be made to appear; then will be shown an added obligation in us, to send to the daughters of fallen Greece, the blessings of such an education.

The human mind will wander to future times. Even the votary of pleasure, who tells us to "pluck the fresh flowret ere it close," though he thinks his motto is present enjoyment, yet unconsciously he mingles a bitter foreboding which destroys the very essence of joy. "Let us haste (he says) for the flowret will soon wither—the roses soon fade. Let music sound—and let us laugh loud, that we need not think of death. Ay, turn away from that open grave. Speak not of the approach of the pestilential cholera. Quick! quick! let us gather the roses, lest the next moment they are blighted for ever!" Is this the spirit of happiness? Is it for this, that we should exchange that desire of doing good, and that willingness to communicate, which flows from a pious heart, as a fresh stream from a rolling fountain? Is it for this, that we are to hold fast for ourselves and our families all that we have or can acquire? Forbid it, gracious Saviour! Thou that didst divest thyself of heaven's glory, and for those who loved thee not wore the garb of poverty and reproach, forbid that those who call themselves by thy name of infinite benevolence and wisdom, should thus be guilty of selfishness and folly! what if the good we undertake be for the distant and the future? when our souls are free, no longer bound to a clod that gravitates to the earth, these things will be neither distant nor future. In the regions where immortal spirits hold blessed communion, we may meet with those, who perchance are led thither by means to which we have been instrumental; and with them look down with joy upon the good which is maturing upon earth—the souls that are ripening for heaven.

HOW TO TEACH.

In searching for the fundamental principles of the science of teaching, I find a few axioms as indisputable, as the first principles of mathematics. One of these is this, HE IS THE BEST TEACHER WHO MAKES THE BEST USE OF HIS OWN TIME AND THAT OF HIS PUPILS. For TIME is all that is given by God in which to do the work of IMPROVEMENT.

What is the first rule to guide us in making the best use of Time? It is, to seek first and most to improve in the best things. He is not necessarily the best teacher who performs the most labour; makes his pupils work the hardest, and bustle the most. A hundred cents of copper, though they make more clatter and fill more space, have only a tenth of the value of one eagle of gold.

WHAT TO TEACH.

What is the best of all possible things to be taught? MORAL GOODNESS. That respects God and man; God first, and man second. To infuse into the mind of a child, therefore love and fear towards God—the perfect—in wisdom, goodness, justice and power,—the Creator, Benefactor, and Saviour, the secret Witness and the Judge—this is of all teaching the very best. But it cannot be accomplished, merely in set times and by set phrases; it should mingle in all the teacher's desires and actions. The child imbibes it when he sees that the instructor feels and acts on it himself. When the youth is untruthful, when he wounds his companion in body—in mind—in character or in property, then show him that his offence is against God; that you are God's ministers to enforce his laws, and must do your duty. Be thus mindful in all sincerity, judge correctly, adopt no subterfuge—pretend not to think the child is better than he is, but deal plainly and truly, though lovingly with him; then his moral approbation will go with you, though it should be against himself, and even if circumstances require you to punish him. The voice of conscience residing in his heart is as the voice of God; and if you invariably interpret that voice with correctness and truth, the child will submit and obey you naturally and affectionately. But if your government is unjust or capricious, if you punish one day, what you pass over or approve another, the dissatisfied child will naturally rebel.

Next to moral goodness is HEALTH AND STRENGTH soundness of body and of mind. This like the former is not what can be taught at set times, and in set phrases; but it must never be lost sight of. It must regulate the measure and the kind of exercise required of the child, both bodily and mental, as well as his diet, air and accommodations. The regular routine of school duties consists in teaching acts for the practice of future life; or sciences in which the useful or ornamental arts find their first principles; and great skill is required of the teacher in assigning to each pupil an order of studies suitable to his age, and then selecting such books and modes of teaching as shall make a little time go far.

CARE OF HEALTH. — TO YOUNG LADIES.

When I am speaking to young girls (the Lord bless and keep them), I am in my proper element. Why should it be otherwise? I have had five thousand under my charge, and spent thirty years of my life devoted to their service; and the general reader will excuse me if I add some further advice to them, which the light of this theory will show to be good. If it is so, others may have its benefit as well as they, but it is most natural to me to address myself to them.

Would you, my dear young ladies, do the will or God on earth by being useful to your fellow-beings? Take care of health. Would you enjoy life? Take care of health; for without it, existence is, for every purpose of enjoyment, worse than a blank. No matter how much wealth or how many luxuries you can command, there is no enjoyment without health. To an aching head what is a downy pillow with silken curtains floating above? What is the cushioned landau and the gardened landscape to her whose disordered lungs can no longer receive the inspirations of an ordinary atmosphere? And what are books, music, and paintings to her whose nervous sufferings give disease to her senses, and agony to her frame?

Would you smooth for your tender parents the pillow of declining life? Take care of health. And does the "prophetic pencil" sometimes trace the form of one whose name perhaps is now unknown, who shall hereafter devote to you a manly and generous heart, and marriage sanction the bond? Would you be a blessing to such a one? then now take care of your health: or if you hesitate, let imagination go still further. Fancy yourself feeble as with untimely age, clad in vestments of sorrow, and leaving a childless home to walk forth with him to the church-yard, there to weep over your buried offspring.

Study then to know your frame that you may, before it is too late, pursue such a course as will secure to you a sound and vigorous constitution.

OF THE FORCE THAT MOVES THE BLOOD.

When circulation is our life, it behoves us to consider well its causes, that we may add reason to instinct in its healthful preservation. That the blood travels through the system by its own volition, none believe; but that it is an inert mass which will only move as it is moved. What then are the forces which move inert bodies? Are there any which may not be resolved into one of these three, impulse, gravitation, and heat; of which the latter has the greater range in point of degree, being in the expansion of a fluid from warm to warmer, the most gentle of all imaginable forces, while in other states it is the most powerful of any known to man. It is then to one or more of these forces that we must look for the motive powers which produce the circulation. And the human circulation has peculiar difficulties to encounter. Man does not enjoy his noble erect position, without some countervailing disadvantages. The long upright column of his blood spreading at its base, presents no trifling force to be moved. And this force is to be overcome by means so gentle that the mind, the dweller in this house of clay, shall not be disturbed by its operations. Again: the parts of the body are to be used by the mind as instruments, and ten thousand different motions are to be performed at its bidding. What but Almighty Wisdom could have effected these several objects? And is it not most reasonable to suppose that this wisdom would assign for these purposes not any one of the forces which move matter, but combine them all? Gravitation by itself cannot produce a circulation by any machinery. Impulse alone could not carry on a circulation without existing in such an excessive degree that it must disturb the mind and endanger the body. But heat, the antagonist force of gravitation, by the lessening or increasing of the maximum and minimum difference, can operate more or less forcibly as occasion requires, and at the same time so gently and so quietly, that the mind shall take no cognizance of its operation as a moving force. It can be so placed that by its expansive force it shall lift gravitation when that obstructs the way, and by its transmission leave to it the course, when its presence as a force would become hurtful. Why, then, should we hesitate to conclude that this is the principal force employed, since we know it exists in the human system? And if it is the principal agent which does actually perform this great work, then if the quantity afforded be small, so much the more perfect the machine, for so much the less will it be likely either to endanger the body or disturb the mind, and so much the more praise is due to the Mighty Artificer

WORTLEY, LADY EMMELINE STUART,

AN English lady, daughter of the Duke of Rutland, and widow of the late Hon. Stuart Wortley. She has written a great deal, and with remarkable rapidity—principally poetry, although she has published one or two novels, which have not been very successful. Her poems would fill more than a dozen volumes; they are "The Knight and the Enchantress," published in 1832; "London at Night, and other poems," in 1834; "The Village Churchyard," in 1835; "The Visionary," in 1837; "Lays of Leisure," in 1838; accounts of her travels, and many occasional poems. She certainly evinces unusual facility in versification, but more care and finish would be an improvement to her style. Some of her shorter poems display brilliancy of imagination, and when her theme is new and inspiring, she becomes impassioned and pathetic. Her poems on America attest the power of her genius as well as the kindness of her heart. Lady Stuart Wortley made the tour of the United States in 1849-50. She contributed a number of poems on the subject of her travels to different periodicals, and early in 1851, her "Travels in the United States" appeared. The work evinces a very different spirit from the recorded opinions of Mrs. Trollope and Miss Martineau. The higher the birth of those who visit our Republic, the better they assimilate with our citizens; as witness the reports made by Captain Marryatt and the Earl of Carlisle.

Lady Stuart Wortley is a woman of refined manners and highly cultivated intellect; we hope England will send forth other travellers to our land of like disposition, to enjoy and to confer pleasure. Then the true sisterly union between the two countries might soon be effected. There is genuine goodness of heart shown in the writings of this lady; her records of what she sees and hears always bring out expressions of feelings and hopes that do honour to human nature. These give value to her works. It is not wit but wisdom—moral goodness—which makes the real worth of literature.

MR. WEBSTER'S RESIDENCE.

We have been much charmed with our visit to Green Harbour, Marshfield, the beautiful domain of Mr. Webster, it is a charming and particularly enjoyable place, almost close to the sea. The beach here is something marvellous, eight miles in breadth, and of splendid, hard, floor-like sand, and when this is covered by the rolling Atlantic, the waves all but come up to the neighbouring green, grassy fields. Very high tides cover them.

This house is very prettily fitted up. It strikes me as being partly in the English and partly in the French style, exceedingly comfortable, and with a number of remarkably pretty drawing-rooms opening into one another, which always is a judicious arrangement I think; it makes a party agreeable and informal. There are a variety of pictures and busts by American artists, and some of them are exceedingly good. There is a picture in the chief drawing-room of Mr. Webster's gallant son, who was killed in the Mexican war. The two greatest of America's statesmen each lost a son in that war, Mr. Clay and Mr. Webster. There is also a fine picture of Mr. Webster himself, which, however, though a masterly painting, does not do justice to the distinguished original. It was executed some years ago; but I really think it is not so handsome as the great statesman is now, with his Olympus-like brow, on which are throned such divinities of thought, and with that wonderful countenance of might and majesty.

The dining-room here is a charming apartment, with all its windows opening to the ground, looking on the garden; and it is deliciously cool, protected from the sun by the overshadowing masses of foliage of the most magnificent weeping (American) elms. These colossal trees stand just before the house, and are pre-eminently beautiful: they seem to unite in their own gigantic persons the exquisite and exceeding grace of the weeping willow, with the strength and grandeur of the towering elm.

The walls of the dining-room are adorned chiefly with English engravings, among which there is one of my father. My bed-room is profusely decorated with prints of different English country houses and castles. The utmost good taste and refinement are perceptible in the arrangements of the house, and a most enchanting place of residence it is.

* * * * *

Mr. Webster's farm here consists of one thousand five hundred acres: he has a hundred head of cattle.

MR. WEBSTER'S GENIUS.

One cannot wonder at the Americans' extreme admiration of the genius and the statesman-like qualities of their distinguished countryman, his glorious and electrifying eloquence, his great powers of ratiocination, his solid judgment, his stores of knowledge, and his large and comprehensive mind—a mind of that real expansion and breadth which, heaven knows, too few public men can boast of.

DREAMS.

Dreams, loveliest mutabilities of ever-changeful earth!
Beauteous and precious blossoming of Time's cold desert dearth,
Incarnadining life's grey mists with sun hues of the south,
And brightening life's horizon-rim with the orient fires of youth.

Like the fair rainbow, linking earth to the blue exulting sky,
And showering o'er the space around a flood of radiancy!
O, wondrous are ye, and sublime in your phases and your powers,
Wrestling from care and feverish woe some few short splendid hours!

From the monarch's brow ye lift the crown! the captive's chains unbind!
Youth unto frozen age ye are, and light unto the blind —
A refuge and a shelter to earth's wanderer, weary-hearted,
And all to the bereaved, since ye restore the long-departed!

To childhood's ken, O! what a world of mystery and of glory!
Surpassing all even childhood meets in the gorgeous realms of story!
All dazzling dyes, all wildering light, all wonder, and all change!
Where the thoughts, like birds of paradise, through an endless sunshine range!

AMERICAN MIND.

Wand'ers! whose feet, like mine, ne'er press'd before
This proud, magnificently-various shore —
Wand'ers! who speed from many a distant zone
To gaze on Nature's transatlantic throne —
Ne'er lightly view the thousand scenes sublime
Of great America's resplendent clime,
But still, in thoughtful mood's observant care,
Weigh well the many-mingling glories there,
Since all the sterner wonders of the land
Are most admired — when best ye understand!
It is a gracious study for the soul,
As, part by part, the Heaven-stamp'd leaves unroll; —
Not only, all-majestic nature here
Speaks to each kindling thought, but, far and near,
A large and mighty meaning seems to lurk,
A glorious mind is every where at work!
A bold, grand spirit rules and reigns around,
And sanctifies the common air and ground,
And glorifies the lowliest herb and stone
With living tints and touches of its own;
A spirit ever flashing back the sun,
That scorns each prize while aught is to be won,
More boundless than the prairie's verdurous sweep,
Or th' old Atlantic's long-resounding deep,
And more luxuriant than the forest's crowd
Of patriarch trees by weightiest foliage bow'd —
More rich than California's teeming mould,
Whose hoarded sunbeams laugh to living gold —
More soaring, far, than th' immemorial hills —
More fresh and flowing than their streams and rills —
That mind, of quenchless energy and power,
Which springs from strength to strength, hour after hour —
Man's glorious mind, in its most glorious mood,
That seems, for aye, on every side to brood,
In this empurpled and exultant land,
So gladly bow'd beneath its bright command —
Man's glorious mind, on its most glorious march —
High-spanning earth, like Heav'n's own rainbow arch —
That soul, that mind, 'tis every where reveal'd!
It crowns the steep, it gilds the cultured field,
It charms the wild, and paves the rushing stream,
And scarce allows the sun a vagrant beam,
It tames the rugged soil of rocks, and flings
From seas to seas the shadow of its wings,
And Time and Space in that great Shadow rest
And watch to serve their ruler-son's behest,
And still its growing, gathering influence spreads,
And still abroad its own great life it sheds,

O'er mount and lake, and cataract, field and flood,
O'er rock and cave and isle, o'er plain and wood,
It lives, it lightens, and in might inspires
Each separate scene with fresh creative fires,
Where'er it moves a Wondering World awakes,
And still all nature's face its likeness takes;
It quickens still, and kindles, and pervades
Her startled deserts and receding shades,
Her mightiest solitudes and paths unknown,
Her hidden shrines and well-springs pure and lone Hung — as The Heavens are hung above them all,
And holding their sublimest powers in thrall!

A FAREWELL TO AMERICA.

Farewell! thou great and gracious land,
Glory and wonder of the earth,
For ever seeming to expand,
Wakening to new majestic birth —
Great, good Columbia!

Farewell! thou chosen second home
Of homeless thousands — countless hosts
That fly from desolation's doom
To these glad, hospitable coasts
Of thine, Columbia!

Of myriads, thou 'rt the cherished goal —
They shape toward thee their eager flight;
A second sun thou shin'st — to soul
As bright as that above the sight —
Great, bright Columbia!

A thousand kind farewells to thee!
Ten thousand salutations fair;
Thanks, tears, and praises, gushing free
And many a hushed, heart-whispered prayer,
For thee, Columbia.

Ay, thousand blessings, warm and true,
Ten thousand wishes for thy weal,
A world of homage — but thy due —
And all that heart can form or feel,
For thee, Columbia.

For thou the stranger know'st to greet
With welcomes glowing as the West,
And well the wanderer's wearied feet
May those kind welcomes charm to rest
In thee, Columbia

What can I wish thee? All hast thou
That thought can dream or tongue can name;
Plumed victory and success thy brow
Have graced with every wreath of fame,
Thrice crowned Columbia!

Thy people's great undying love
Builds walls of adamant and steel —
Thy mightiest barrier this shall prove,
And pledge of thy perpetual weal,
Thrice arm'd Columbia.

What can I wish thee? Arms and arts
Shed o'er thee glory's richest gleam —
Still at thy call, crowned knowledge starts —
What can I wish, or think, or dream
For thee, Columbia?

"Continuance," — still the same career,
The same triumphant course! — proceed!
Onward! — with changeless, stateliest cheer,
The universe shall follow. Lead!
On! on! Columbia!

Thy step is lightning, and thy breath
An earthquake-storm, far felt around;
All earth's past life seems sleep or death
To thy great movement, without bound,
Thy march, Columbia.

Man's loftiest happiness and good,
 That — that thou still dost seek and ask;
 By thee 't is nobly understood —
 'T is made thy one great sovereign task,
     Thine aim, Columbia.

Thou crescent country! — evermore
 Showing a brighter, grander face,
 Honour to thee, still o'er and o'er.
 And honour to that glorious race —
     Thy sons, Columbia.

Thy Titan sons! they heave on high
 The mountains of their greatness still;
 Yea, their own greatness seeks the sky,
 'To scale its sun-heights at their will.
     Be proud, Columbia!

No need have they of towers to aid,
 Of giant steps, or cloud capp'd steeps;
 Their tow'ring heads the heights invade
 With feet firm planted in the deeps,
     To serve Columbia.

Their spirits sweep like waves of fire
 On the untrod shores beyond to break,
 And as they still ascend, aspire,
 A world's foundations seem to shake —
     Not thine, Columbia!

Thou nobler, newer world sublime!
 Thou hast a long bright race to run
 Still shall those spirits soar and climb,
 Since naught seems gained till all is won
     For thee, Columbia.

Caucasus of creation, thou!
 Rising above all heights yet tried;
 The very spheres might seem to bow
 'To meet, half-way, thy crest of pride —
     Thy stars — Columbia!

Thy Titan sons — they conquering pass,
 And empire in their pathway springs;
 History uplifts for them her glass;
 Renown for them outspreads her wings,
     And shouts, "Columbia!"

Thy daughters — fairy forms they wear;
 Flowers of the setting sun, in vain;
 Their smiles a rising sun appear,
 'Till wins the East's own roseate reign —
     Thy West, Columbia!

Farewell to each! farewell to all! —
 'The free, the beautiful, the great —
 To mount and wood, field, flood and fall,
 Thy walls of strength, and walks of state,
     And thee, Columbia!

Let tears these parting sorrows tell!
 Sisters, sweet sisters mine, adieu!
 And, glorious brothers, fare ye well —
 If there can be farewell to you,
     And thee, Columbia!

Oh! who can say "Farewell" to thee?
 Where'er we go thy tracks we find;
 From zone to zone, from sea to sea,
 We hail thy majesty of mind,
     And thee, Columbia!

Here, thy great fleets bestride the main;
 There, thy, blest missions, call to Heaven;
 Here, doth thy boundless commerce reign;
 And there thine artists' souls have striven —
     For thee, Columbia

For thee, for thy true glory still,
 Labours full many a gifted hand;
 Works of thy sons' creative skill
 Adorn full many a stranger land,
     For thee, Columbia.

No! there is no farewell to thee —
 Still more and more thine influence spreads;
 Where'er we move, by land or sea,
 A life, a light thy presence sheds —
     Thy flower, Columbia!

A glorious life — a dazzling light —
 Blessing all those who feel and see;
 A flash — a portion of thy might —
 No! there is no farewell to thee,
     Or thine, Columbia!

And least of all, when bound to shores
 Which deathless ties with thee unite,
 What though between old ocean roars?
 England seems mingling in her might
     With thee, Columbia

Then no farewell! but blessings still,
 And many a kindly parting word;
 And may they gain the wished for skill
 To touch and thrill an answering chord
     In thee, Columbia.

Scorn not your English sister's tones —
 Scorn not your English sister's tears,
 For they are truths — and trusting ones —
 And each a world of feeling bears,
     For your Columbia!

Be blessings on yon barks! They bring Friendship and faith in glad increase.
 From them what wealth of good shall spring,
 Whose richest freight is earth's deep peace —
     Thy peace, Columbia?

Away with reckless strifes and wars —
 Those barks have nobler missions found;
 The people's great ambassadors —
 Shall they shed aught but concord round?
     Say thou, Columbia!

For thou, the people's precious weal
 Dost study well, and justly weigh,
 Even with a strong and sacred zeal;
 And doth not peace best serve them, say?
     Reply, Columbia.

Blessed be the barks! — Methinks I hear,
 A shout, as of the seas! — "Rejoice!
 Earth! rest in peace!" and far and near Repeats thy thousand thundering voice,
     "Peace! peace! Columbia!"

War's glory fades, and day by day,
 Art, knowledge, enterprise, and trade
 March in magnificent array:
 That still such progress may be made,
     Heaven save Columbia!

YOUNG WRITERS AND OTHERS.

UNDER this title is included not only the youthful who have scarcely ceased to blush when their names are mentioned in connexion with authorship, but also those who, from hindrances of various sorts, have not yet reached the best eminence within their power. Writers of poetry and contributors to periodicals who have not collected their articles into a volume come under this rule. Such can only be judged by a few desultory sketches or poems; we cannot assign them a fixed position. A lady traveller who has given the particulars of one journey, or description of foreign countries during one tour, can scarcely be said to have distinguished herself in literature, unless her work is of extraordinary merit. Yet, as our aim is to give the perfect impression of female intellect and its records, it could not be accomplished unless we included the names of those who are not, perhaps, widely known, and yet are contributing to make the present century remarkable for its intelligent women. Moreover, there are some sketches in this second section which could not be obtained in season for insertion in the first section of the living; and a few, accidentally omitted. All these are here brought together, associated, where every lady would like to find her name, with youth, hope, and promise. Arranging these "Young Writers," &c., in alphabetical order, nationally, shows at a glance, the degree and inclination of the development of female intellect, in every country. It is also curious to remark that nearly in this order is the greatest, or, at any rate, the most active and most beneficial influence of the sex exerted. Those peculiarities in the present development of female genius which were described in our "Remarks on the Fourth Era," are here strikingly illustrated. America has the most numerous band of female poets and teachers; these hold sway over the heart and the affections. Out of the heart are the issues of life. A well-written book for children is of more value to human progress and more significant of its quiet but effective onward march, than is a great work on philosophy, however brilliant may be its style or imposing its subject. Where these good books for children and youth are in the greatest request, there woman has the greatest moral influence, and uses it the best. The intellect and taste are highly cultivated in England; physical education is better understood there than in the United States — but the heart and soul are bowed to the worship of caste and condition.

AMERICAN.

ALLIN, ABBY

RESIDES in Pomfret, Connecticut. Her poems have appeared in several periodicals, over the signature of "Nilla," her own name reversed, during several past years. In 1850, these poems, with some prose papers, contributed to the Boston Journal, were published. "Home Ballads, a book for New Englanders," is its title, descriptive of its spirit and sentiments. The writings of Miss Allin are filled with warm sympathies for the working-day world; she has a cheerful, hopeful philosophy, and loves "home, children and friends." The expression of these feelings makes her Ballads popular.

BAILEY, MARGARET L.,

By birth Miss Shands, was born in Sussex, Virginia, in 1812. In 1833, she was married to Mr. G. Bailey, of Cincinnati, at present editor of the National Era, at Washington. During Mrs. Bailey's residence in Cincinnati, she edited "The Youth's Monthly Visitor," a Juvenile periodical which was conducted with unusual ability and met with great success, but was discontinued in 1846, in consequence of her removal to Washington.

Mrs. Bailey is favourably known both as a poetess and a prose writer. Her productions principally have appeared in the periodicals edited by her husband and herself, and have contributed much to their success.

BARNES, SUSAN REBECCA,

Is a daughter of the Hon. Richard H. Ayer, of Manchester, New Hampshire, at which place Mrs. Barnes now resides. Her poems have been favourably received, and show greater strength and vigor than those that are written by the generality of her sex.

BAYARD, ELISE JUSTINE,

Is a native of New York. The few poems that she has published are enough to entitle her to take a high rank among the poetesses of our country. No collection of her writings has ever been made.

BOGART, ELIZABETH,

DAUGHTER of the Rev. David S. Bogart, was born in the city of New York, where she now resides. She has, however, resided in other places, and, in a letter to a friend, she thus describes a place where the family lived when she was about sixteen years of age.

"Hempstead Harbor is a most romantic spot on the western part of Long Island—where, instead of the wide-spread level country we had just left, and the everlasting sounding of the magnificent ocean, we found ourselves located in a lovely valley, at the head of a beautiful bay with its ebbing and flowing tides, and surrounded with hills covered with forest trees and evergreens. I am an enthusiastic admirer of scenery, and think it was in that place that the natural romance of my disposition was augmented and encouraged, until it was brought to exercise an enduring influence over my mind. I would not wish it otherwise—for it appears to me to be a refining sentiment, which, though it may sometimes unfit us for the rough angles of the real world, amply repays us by the charm of the ideal."

It was there she probably formed her taste for descriptive poetry in which she most excels. She has written much for the Periodicals, and generally over the name of Estille; her first productions appeared in 1825. She has also written in prose, and four of her tales have taken prizes; and what is of more consequence to our sketch of her, have been deserving of this success. She is best known by her poems, some of which have been very popular.

HE CAME TOO LATE.

He came too late! Neglect had tried
Her constancy too long;
Her love had yielded to her pride,
And the deep sense of wrong.
She scorn'd the offering of a heart
Which linger'd on its way,
Till it could no delight impart,
Nor spread one cheering ray.

He came too late! At once he felt
That all his power was o'er;
Indifference in her calm smile dwelt;
She thought of him no more.
Anger and grief had passed away,
Her heart and thoughts were free;
She met him, and her words were gay;
No spell had memory.

He came too late! The subtle chords
Of love were all unbound;
Not by offence of spoken words,
But by the slights that wound.
She knew that life held nothing now
That could the past repay,
Yet she disdain'd his tardy vow,
And coldly turn'd away.

He came too late! Her countless dreams
Of hope had long since flown;
No charms dwelt in his chosen themes,
Nor in his whisper'd tone.
And when, with word and smile, he tried
Affection still to prove,
She nerved her heart with woman's pride,
And spurn'd his fickle love.

AN AUTUMN VIEW FROM MY WINDOW

I gaze with raptured eyes
Upon the lovely landscape, as it lies
Outstretch'd before my window: even now
The mist is sailing from the mountain's brow
For it is early morning, and the sun
His course has just begun

How beautiful the scene
Of hill on hill arising, while between
The river, like a silvery streak appears.
And rugged rocks, the monuments of years.
Resemble the old castles on the Rhine,
Which look down on the vine.

No clustering grapes, 'tis true,
Hang from these mountain-sides to meet the view;
But fairer than the vineyards is the sight
Of our luxuriant forests, which, despite
The change of nations, hold their ancient place.
Lost to the Indian race.

Untiring I survey
The prospect from my window, day by day.
Something forgotten, though just seen before,
Something of novelty or beauty more
Than yet discover'd, ever charms my eyes,
And wakes a fresh surprise.

And thus, when o'er my heart
A weary thought is stealing, while apart
From friends and the gay world, I sit alone,
With life's dark veil upon the future thrown,
I look from out my window, and there find
A solace for the mind.

The Indian Summer's breath
Sighs gently o'er the fallen leaflet's death,
And bids the frost-king linger on his way
Till Autumn's tints have brighten'd o'er decay
What other clime can such rich painting show?
Tell us, if any know!

BOLTON, SARAH T.,

A POETESS, and a contributor to some of the best periodicals of the Union, is a native of Ohio, where she now lives. Thought and feeling stamp her verses with the mark of sincerity and earnestness.

BROOKS, MARY E.,

Is a native of New York City. Her maiden name was Aiken. She wrote for several years under the name of Norna. In 1828, Miss Aiken married James G. Brooks, also an author, and in 1829 they published their writings in a volume entitled "The Rivals of Este, and other Poems."

The principal poem in the work is by Mrs. Brooks. Mr. Brooks died at Albany, in 1841, and since then Mrs. Brooks has resided in New York. Some of her lyrics are very beautiful.

PSALM CXXXVII

Come, sweep the harp! one thrilling rush
Of all that warm'd its chords to song,
And then the strains for ever hush
That oft have breathed its wires along!
The ray is quench'd that lit our mirth,
The shrine is gone that claim'd the prayer;
And, exiles o'er the distant earth,
How can we wake the carol there?

One sigh, my harp! and then to sleep,
For all that loved thy song have flown;
Why should'st thou lonely vigils keep,
Forsaken, broken, and alone?

Let this sad murmur be thy last,
Nor e'er again in music swell;
Thine hours of joyousness are past,
And thus we sever. Fare thee well!

"OH, NEVER BELIEVE, LOVE."

Oh, never believe, love, the music that floats
So light from my harp is a truant to thee;
In the heart there are deeper and holier notes
Than e'er to the harp-string were utter'd by me;
And like the wild numbers that silently lay *
Till morn's magic finger awoke them to song,
Thy thought to my soul is the life-lighting ray,
And music and rapture flow swiftly along.

And while the light flow'rets I carelessly twine,
That fancy has pluck'd in her perishing bower,
'Tis only to cover the heart and the shrine,
Where thine image still hallows each happier hour.
And never believe, love, tho' brightness they fling,
They can win from my spirit a moment of rest;
It is only the touch of the nightingale's wing
As she hurries along to the leaf she loves best.

C.

CAMPBELL, JULIET H. L.,

Is a native of Pennsylvania, and a daughter of Judge Lewis, of that State. She was married in 1843, since which event she has resided in Pottsville. Mrs. Campbell's poetical talents were very early developed, and she began to be known for her genius when almost a child. Since her marriage she has been a frequent and valued contributor, both in prose and verse, to the best periodicals.

A STORY OF SUNRISE.

Where the old cathedral towers,
With its dimly lighted dome,
Underneath its morning shadow
Nestles my beloved home;
When the summer morn is breaking
Glorious, with its golden beams,
Through my open latticed window
Matin music wildly streams.
Not the peal of deep-toned organ
Smites the air with ringing sound;
Not the voice of singing maiden
Sighing softer music round;
Long ere these have hail'd the morning,
Is the mystic anthem heard,
Wildly, fervently, outpouring,
From the bosom of a bird.
Every morn he takes his station
On the cross which crowns the spire,
And, with heaven-born inspiration,
Vents in voice his bosom's fire;
Every morn when light and shadow,
Struggling, blend their gold and grey,
From the cross, midway to heaven,
Streams his holy melody.
Like the summons from the turrets
Of an eastern mosque it seems:
"Come to prayer; to prayer, ye faithful!"
Echoes through my morning dreams.
Heedful of the invitation
Of the pious messenger,
Lo! I join in meek devotion
With so lone a worshipper.
And a gushing, glad thanksgiving,
From my inmost heart doth thrill,
To our Ever Friend in heaven,
As our blent glad voices trill.

Then the boy who rests beside me
Softly opes his starry eyes
Tosses back his streaming ringlets,
Gazes round in sweet surprise.
He, though sleeping, felt the radiance
Struggling through the curtain'd gloom;
Heard the wild, harmonious hymning,
Break the stillness of my room:
These deliciously commingled
With the rapture of his dreams,
And the heaven of which I've told him
On his childish vision gleams.
Guardian seraphs, viewless spirits,
Brooding o'er the enchanted air,
Pause, with folded wings, to listen
To the lisplings of his prayer;
Up, to the recording angel,
When their ward on earth is done,
They will bear the guileless accents
Of my infant's orison.

CASE, LUELLE J. B.

Is a native of Kingston, New Hampshire. Her father was the Hon. Levi Bartlett of that state. Some time after Miss Bartlett's marriage, she removed to Cincinnati, where she still resides. Her writings both in prose and verse, though generally admired, have never yet been collected.

ENERGY IN ADVERSITY.

Onward! Hath earth's ceaseless change
Trampled on thy heart?
Faint not, for that restless range
Soon will heal the smart.
Trust the future: time will prove
Earth hath stronger, truer love.

Bless thy God — the heart is not
An abandoned urn,
Where, all lonely and forgot,
Dust and ashes mourn:
Bless him, that his mercy brings
Joy from out its withered things

Onward, for the truths of God —
Onward, for the right!
Firmly let the field be trod,
In life's coming fight;
Heaven's own hand will lead thee on,
Guard thee till thy task is done!

Then wilt brighter, sweeter flowers
Blossom round thy way,
Than ere sprung in Hope's glad bowers,
In thine early day:
And the rolling years shall bring
Strength and healing on their wing.

CHANDLER, CAROLINE H.

Is a native of Philadelphia. Her maiden name was Hieskill. She has not written much. A few poems are all that have appeared with her name attached to them; yet these are sufficient to evince a warm and impassioned temperament, ardent feelings, and great poetic sensibility.

CHENEY, HARRIET V.

Is a native of Massachusetts. Her love of literature was developed in childhood, probably owing much to the influence of her mother's taste and genius, who was author of one of the earliest American novels, "The Coquette, or History of Eliza Wharton." Soon after the subject of our notice left school, she wrote, in conjunction with her sister, "The Sunday School, or Village Sketches," which was published anonymously.

* The Statue of Memnon.

It was popular, the edition was soon exhausted, and the authors were solicited to republish it;—but not having secured the copyright, another writer had seized on the book, changed the title to “Charles Hartland,” and published it for his own benefit. This appropriation of the writings of women by men has been repeatedly done; thus Miss Hannah Adams was injured, and Miss Strickland plundered; while such men are usually the most authoritative in claiming for their own sex all the talents. The next work, “A Peep at the Pilgrims,” passed through two editions, and was re-published in London. It is an interesting story of the early settlers of New England, and has lately been re-printed in Boston. “The Rivals of Acadia,” was the next; and then for a number of years Mrs. Cheney’s time was wholly devoted to her family. The death of her husband, by rendering her own exertions on behalf of her children essential to their education, has called her again into the field of literature. Her latest books, “Sketches from the Life of Christ;” and “Confessions of an early Martyr,” appeared in 1846; she has since been a contributor to “The Literary Garland,” a Monthly Magazine published in Montreal, Canada, where Mrs. Cheney now resides. Her sister, Mrs. CUSHING, is editor of the “Garland,” and has written several books for the young, and poems: “Esther, a Dramatic Poem,” is a work of deep interest. These two amiable and intelligent sisters are doing much, in a quiet way, for the literary taste and moral improvement of the youth of Canada.

COOPER, MISS,

DAUGHTER of the distinguished novelist, J. Fennimore Cooper, has written a work of rare merit, entitled “Rural Hours; by a Lady,” published in 1850. It is a journal of daily life, commencing with the spring of 1848, and ending with the spring of 1849. The scenery described so charmingly is that surrounding her own fair home in Cooperstown: out of these simple materials Miss Cooper has formed one of the most interesting volumes of the day, displaying powers of mind of an high order. This path of literature is peculiarly appropriate for our own sex and our new country. Beautified as these scenes from common life may be by the touch of genius and the soul of piety, we are taught how fair is the world we live in, when viewed in the gentle spirit of love, hope, and faith.

COXE, MARGARET,

WAS born in Burlington, New Jersey. Her father was William Coxe, Esq., long an eminent citizen of that place. Miss Coxe, as a delicate child, was educated chiefly at home; a choice library, a beautiful garden, and a pious family, united with her own love of study, gave the bias to her mind which has proved of such benefit to others. She is now one of the most accomplished educators of her own sex in the country; because to her thorough discipline of mind is added the true religion of heart which has such an influence in moulding the characters of the young. Miss Coxe has written some excellent works, among which are “Botany of the Scriptures;” “Wonders of the Deep;” and “The Young Lady’s Companion,” in a series of Letters, replete with the faithful monitions and precepts a good mother, or rather an affectionate elder sister would urge on those under her care. Miss Coxe is now at the head of a large and popular seminary for young ladies in Cincinnati, Ohio.

D.

DINNIES, ANNA PEYKE,

A POETESS known at first under the name of Moina, was born in Georgetown, South Carolina. Her father, Judge Shackleford, removed to Charleston when Anna was a child, where she was educated. In 1830, Miss Shackleford married John C. Dinnies of St. Louis, Missouri, where she has since resided. The poetry of Mrs. Dinnies is characterized by vigour of thought and delicate tenderness of feeling. There is something exceedingly fascinating in the display of intellectual power, when it seems entirely devoted to the happiness of others. It is genius performing the office of a guardian angel. There is a fervidness in the expressions of this writer, which goes to the heart of the reader at once, and exalts the strain, no matter what the theme may be. In the regions of imagination she does not soar far or often; the wild and mysterious are not her passion; but the holy fire of poesy burns pure and bright in her own heart, and she cherishes it to illumine and bless her own hearth. The genius that has warmed into summer beauty a frozen “Chrysanthemum,” that “peerless picture of a modest wife,” should be cherished and encouraged; for this “beauty-making power” it is which most essentially aids religious truths to refine and purify social and domestic life. Besides her contributions to periodicals, Mrs. Dinnies prepared a handsome volume, “The Floral Year,” published in 1847.

LINES

Addressed to a White Chrysanthemum, presented to the writer in December.

Fair gift of Friendship! and her ever bright
And faultless image! welcome now thou art,
In thy pure loveliness—thy robes of white,
Speaking a moral to the feeling heart:
Unscathed by heats—by wintry blasts unmoved—
Thy strength thus tested—and thy charms improved.

Emblem of innocence, which fearless braves
Life’s dreariest scenes, its rudest storm derides,
And floats as calmly on, o’er troubled waves,
As where the peaceful streamlet smoothly glides;
Thou’rt blooming now as beautiful and clear,
As other blossoms do, when Spring is here.

Symbol of hope, still banishing the gloom,
Hung o’er the mind by stern December’s reign!
Thou cheer’st the fancy by thy steady bloom
With thoughts of Summer and the fertile plain
Calling a thousand visions into play,
Of beauty redolent—and bright as May!

Type of a true and holy love; the same
Through every scene that crowds life's varied page;
'Mid grief—'mid gladness, spell of every dream,
'Tender in youth — and strong in feeble age!
The peerless picture of a modest wife,
Thou bloom'st the fairest 'midst the frosts of life.

THE WIFE.

"She flung her white arms round him — Thou art all
That this poor heart can cling to."

I could have stemmed misfortune's tide,
And borne the rich one's sneer,
Have braved the haughty glance of pride,
Nor shed a single tear.
I could have smiled on every blow
From Life's full quiver thrown,
While I might gaze on thee, and know
I should not be "alone."

I could — I think I could have brooked,
E'en for a time, that thou
Upon my fading face hadst looked
With less of love than now;
For then I should at least have felt
'The sweet hope still my own,
To win thee back, and, whilst I dwelt
On earth, not been "alone."

But thus to see, from day to day,
Thy brightening eye and cheek,
And watch thy life-sands waste away,
Unnumbered, slowly, neek;
To meet thy smiles of tenderness,
And catch the feeble tone
Of kindness, ever breathed to bless,
And feel, I'll be "alone;"

To mark thy strength each hour decay,
And yet thy hopes grow stronger,
As filled with heaven-ward trust, they say,
"Earth may not claim thee longer;"
Nay, dearest, 't is too much — this heart
Must break when thou art gone;
It must not be; we may not part;
I could not live "alone!"

DODD, MARY ANN HAMMER,

Was born in 1813. She is a native of Hartford, Connecticut, and still resides in that city. As a poetess, she has been known for the last seventeen years, but as her writings have been scattered through various magazines, she is not as generally appreciated as she deserves to be, and as she probably would be, were her articles presented in a more compact form to the world. Some of her poems are gems of thought and feeling.

E.

EAMES, ELIZABETH J.,

Was born in the state of New York. Her maiden name was Jesup. She was married in 1837, and removed to New Hartford, near Utica, in her native state. Mrs. Eames has been for several years a valued contributor to many of the most popular journals of the day.

THE PICTURE OF A DEPARTED POETESS.

Thine still, clear, radiant face! doth it resemble
In each fair, faultless lineament thine own?
Methinks on that enchanting lip doth tremble
The soul that breathes thy lyre's melodious tone.
The soul of music, oh! ethereal spirit,
Fills the dream-haunted sadness of thine eyes;
Sweet poetess! thou surely didst inherit
Thy gifts celestial from the upper skies.

EAMES, JANE A.,

Of Massachusetts, is known as a very successful writer of books for the young. She has prepared a number of Sunday School books, for the Protestant Episcopal S. S. Union. "My Mother's Jewel; or Happy in Life and Death," "Agnes and Eliza," and several other well written and popular works, are among these.

ESLING, CATHARINE H. W.,

Was born in Philadelphia, in 1812. Under her maiden name of Waterman she was long a favourite writer in the periodicals of the country, and she won her place among the poetical writers of the age by qualities which commend her effusions to the hearts of her readers. Her poems are the expressions of a true woman's soul: she excels in portraying feeling, and in expressing the warm and tender emotions of one to whom home has ever been the lode-star of the soul. In pathos and delicacy she has few equals. Her only published book is entitled "The Broken Bracelet and Other Poems." — 1850.

F.

FARRAR, MRS.,

WIFE of Professor John Farrar of Harvard University, has written several works of merit. Warmly interested in the cause of human improvement, she has prepared her books for the young, and chiefly for those of her own sex. "The Life of Lafayette," "The Life of Howard," "Youth's Letter Writer," "The Children's Robinson Crusoe," and a number of others, well-known to the children of New-England are her works. But her most important production is "The Young Lady's Friend," published in 1837, one of the best manuals of its kind extant. The work has been lately revised, the first set of stereotype plates having been worn out, which is a sure proof of the popularity of this excellent book.

FULLER, FRANCES A.,

Was born in Monroeville, Ohio, about 1826. She is just rising into notice as a young writer of brilliant promise both in prose and verse.

FULLER, METTA VICTORIA,

YOUNGER sister to the preceding, more generally known by her nom de plume of "Singing Sibyl," has attracted much attention as a young poetess of uncommon facility and grace.

G.

GREEN, FRANCES HARRIET,

Whose maiden name was Whipple, was born in Smithfield, Rhode Island. Her family is one of the most honourable in the state, and some of the members have displayed uncommon talents. While very young she showed a decided genius, and poetry was her first production. A number of her fugitive pieces appeared from 1830 to 1835. Her first prose work was "Memoirs of Eleanor Elbridge"—a coloured woman, which was very successful. Her next book was a singular one to emanate from a woman's mind—"The Mechanic," addressed to operatives. This appeared in 1841, and in 1844, she published "Might and Right," an historical sketch of the doings of the two political parties during the attempts to form a new constitution for the state of Rhode Island. In the following years she wrote for the "Reform Periodicals," so called, principally, and in 1848, became editress of a magazine, "The Young People's Journal," in the hope of "combining the gems of science with the flowers of literature." Mrs. Green is an original and often a powerful writer. Her poetry is marked in its character. "The Dwarf's Story" is passionate and thrilling; some of her descriptive poems are exceedingly beautiful, and all are imbued with the warm, earnest spirit of the seeker after good. Her writings show a vivid imagination and carefully cultivated intellect; but we fear she has wasted her fine talents on sectarian and political discussions, and thus failed of doing the good or enjoying the success her philanthropy deserves, and her genius should effect.

II.

HAIGHT, SARAH ROGERS,

Is descended from ancestors distinguished for their piety and learning. The Rev. John Elliot, in his "Biographical Dictionary," containing a brief account of the first settlers, eminent characters, &c., who came to New England, gives the following notice:

"The church of Ipswich was supplied with a pastor by the name of Rogers, above one hundred years. The family descended from Mr. John Rogers, who was the first English martyr to the cause of the Reformation; he was burnt at Smithfield, 1553.

Mr. Rogers of Dedham, was his grandson; whose son Nathaniel came over to New England, and was in the church at Ipswich between forty and fifty years.

Mr. Rogers of Littleton, who was graduated in 1725, with whom the compiler of this work once served as an assistant, possessed very superior talents; was a very rational and learned divine, a man of scientific research, and a complete gentleman in his manners.

The branches of the family are numerous; no one name has been more conspicuous among the divines of Massachusetts."

The maternal ancestors of the subject of this memoir descended from Richard Smith, who was an officer under Cromwell, and who emigrated from England in the beginning of the eighteenth century. He purchased of the natives, the territory now constituting the town of Smithtown, in Suffolk County, N. Y. The estate occupied by the original patentee, has continued in the possession of his direct descendants to the present time; and the gentleman who may now be considered as the head of the family, worthily sustains its characteristic reputation for energy, urbanity, and hospitality.

Sarah Rogers was born in the city of New York, and educated in its best schools. She was married at a very early age, to Richard K. Haight, Esq., a native and resident of the same city. A natural fondness for travel, and love of adventure, stimulated doubtless by the glowing descriptions given her by her husband of those far-off lands, and classic shores, over which he had already travelled extensively, inspired her with an ardent desire to visit them in person.

A few years elapsed, during which she cultivated studies with reference to her favourite design; when she was gratified to the full extent of her most sanguine anticipations, in being conducted over almost every country of Europe, as well as portions of Asia and Africa.

The extent of her periprinations may be inferred from the following lines borrowed from her "Letters from the Old World."

To Tartary's desert plains, from fertile Gallic lands,

From Norway's rocky coasts, to Nubia's burning sands,

We've wander'd.

On Briton's Druid stones, Scythia's mounds on eastern plains,

Odin's temples in the North, o'er Memnon's cavern'd fane,

We've ponder'd.

The Gaul, Goth, and Saxon, Scandinavian and Hun,

Greek, Turcoman, Arab and Nubia's swarthy son,

We've confronted," &c.

To a residence of several years in various foreign capitals, affording the usual concomitants of society suited to every taste; with galleries and libraries, wherein the amateur and student might revel at pleasure, was superadded the advantages of being made acquainted with men of letters and science of every nation; the friends, associates, and colleagues of the conductor of her wanderings.

"The extent to which she improved her rare opportunities, can be appreciated by those only, who have the happiness to be intimately acquainted with the estimable qualities of her mind and heart," says the gentleman to whom we are indebted for the foregoing sketch, who has known its subject from her childhood—"while those who are acquainted only with the beautiful emanations of her pen will join us in regretting that Mrs. Haight has not continued her reminiscences and observations." Her only published work—"Letters from the Old World: by a Lady of New York," was received with much favour when it appeared, in 1840. It is in two volumes, containing a great variety of interesting information, and at the time was considered one of the best descriptive books of travel modern tourists had furnished: it was highly creditable to the talents and acquirements of Mrs. Haight.

HEWITT, MARY E.,

Was born in Malden, Massachusetts; her maiden name was Moore. Her mother, left early a widow, removed to Boston, where Miss Moore continued to live until her marriage with Mr. James L. Hewitt, when she changed her place of residence to the city of New York. In 1845, Mrs. Hewitt published a small volume of poems, selected from her contributions to the various periodicals, entitled, "Songs of our Land, and other Poems." Many of these had appeared and attracted much attention, under the signature of "Jane." These verses are evidently the utterance of a warm and impassioned heart, and strong imagination. The thoughts are expressed gracefully and harmoniously, and bear the stamp of truth and originality. In 1850, Mrs. Hewitt edited a gift book, called "The Gem of the Western World;" and the "Memorial" a beautiful tribute to the memory of her friend, Mrs. Frances S. Osgood.

THE SPIRIT-BOND.

What is the spell that binds my soul,
As with a silver cord, to thee;
That brims with joy life's golden bowl,
And wakes each pulse to ecstasy?

Methinks, in some far distant sphere,
Some star in memory dimly set,
That we, for years long Sundered here,
In high communion erst have met.

And yet our souls to each were dark,
As is the broad, mysterious sea;
Till lighted by the electric spark,
Struck from the chain of SYMPATHY

'T is sympathy that binds my soul,
As with a silver cord, to thee;
That brims with joy life's golden bowl,
And wakes each pulse to ecstasy.

THE BRIDE'S REVERIE.

Lonely to-night, oh, loved one! is our dwelling,
And lone and wearily hath gone the day;
For thou, whose presence like a flood is swelling
With joy my life-tide—thou art far away.

And wearily for me will go the morrow,
While for thy voice, thy smile, I vainly yearn;
Oh, from fond thought some comfort I will borrow
To while away the hours till thou return!

I will remember that first, sweet revealing
Wherewith thy love o'er my tranced being stole;
I, like the Pythoness enraptured, feeling
The god divine pervading all my soul.

I will remember each fond aspiration
In secret mingled with thy cherished name,
Till from thy lips, in wildering modulation,
Those words of ecstasy "I love thee!" came.

And I will think of all our blest communing,
And all thy low-breathed words of tenderness;
Thy voice to me its melody attuning
Till every tone seemed fraught with a caress.

And feel thee near me, while in thought repeating
The treasured memories thou alone dost share—
Hark! with hushed breath and pulses wildly beating
I hear thy footstep bounding o'er the stair!

And I no longer to my heart am telling
The weary weight of loneliness it bore;
For thou, whose love makes heaven within our dwelling
Thou art returned, and all is joy once more.

THE CHILD OF FAME.

"Je vivrai éternellement."—La vie de Sappho. Traduction de Madame Dacier.

Nay—call me not thy rose—thine own sweet flower,
For, oh, my soul to thy wild words is mute!
Leave me my gift of song—my glorious dower—
My hand unchanged, and free to sweep the lute.

Thus, when within the tomb thy memory slumbers,
Mine, mine will be of those immortal names
Sung by the poet in undying numbers:
Call me not thine—I am the world's and fame's!

Were it not blissful, when from earth we sever,
To know that we shall leave, with bard and sage,
A name enrolled on fame's bright page for ever,
A wonder, and a theme to after age!

Talk not of love! I know how, wasted, broken,
The trusting heart learns its sad lesson o'er—
Counting the roses Passion's lips have spoken,
Amid the thorns that pierce it to the core.

Oh, heart of mine! that when life's summer hour
For thee with love's bright blossoms hung the bough
Too quickly found an asp beneath the flower—
And is naught left thee but ambition now?

Alas! alas! this brow its pride forsaking,
Would give the glory of its laurel crown
For one fond breast whereon to still its aching—
For one true heart that I might call mine own!

HOPKINS, LOUISA PAYSON,

DAUGHTER of the Rev. Dr. Payson, distinguished for his learning and piety, and wife of the Rev. Mr. Hopkins, professor in Williams College, Mass., has written a number of works for the young, which are greatly valued for their excellent mode of illustrating the Bible and its doctrines. Among her books published previously to her marriage, was "The Pastor's Daughter," which gave its author a high reputation for talents as well as religious zeal. Her latest work is, "The Guiding Star; or the Bible God's Message," a sequel to "Henry Langdon, or what was I made for?" published in 1846. These two books contain, well arranged and clearly set forth, such evidences of the truth of God's revealed Word, as must make the Bible History interesting to the youngest child who can read it, and furnish to the mother a manual for the edification of her own mind, as well as a guide to aid in instructing her family. Mrs. Hopkins should hold a high rank among Christian writers.

HORSFORD, MARY GARDINER,

Was born in the city of New York, 1824. Her father, Samuel S. Gardiner, soon after removed to the family mansion on Shelter Island, where her mother's ancestors had resided. Here, in this secluded and beautiful place, Miss Gardiner passed the greater portion of her youth, books and nature her chief companions. She soon became, from a reader of poetry, a writer; her father's library was her best means of education, although she had other good instructors. In 1840 she was placed in the Albany Female Seminary, where she continued three years with great advantage. Soon afterwards she began her contributions, by request, to the Knickerbocker; and also wrote for the Lady's Book, and other periodicals. In 1847 Miss Gardiner was married to Eben Norton Horsford, Rumford Professor in Harvard University at Cambridge. Since her marriage Mrs. Horsford has written some of her most beautiful poetry. There is an exquisite delicacy of fancy, united with power of thought in her verses, that is rarely equalled by those who have established their fame. No collection of her writings has been made.

MY NATIVE ISLE.

My native isle! my native isle!
Forever round thy sunny steep
The low waves curl with sparkling foam
And solemn murmurs deep,
While o'er the surging waters blue
The ceaseless breezes throng,
And in the grand old woods awake
An everlasting song.

The sordid strife and petty cares
That crowd the city's street,
The rush, the race, the storm of Life
Upon thee never meet;
But quiet and contented hearts
Their daily tasks fulfil,
And meet with simple hope and trust
The coming good or ill.

The spireless church stands plain and browe
The winding road beside;
The green graves rise in silence near,
With moss-grown tablets wide;
And early on the Sabbath morn,
Along the flowery sod,
Unfettered souls, with humble prayer,
Go up to worship God.

And dearer far than sculptured fame
Is that gray church to me,
For in its shade my mother sleeps,
Beneath the willow-tree;
And often when my heart is raised,
By sermon and by song,
Her friendly smile appears to me
From the seraphic throng.

The sunset glow, the moon-lit stream
Part of my being are;
The fairy flowers that bloom and die,
The skies so clear and far,
The stars that circle Night's dark brow,
The winds and waters free,
Each with a lesson all its own
Are monitors to me.

The systems in their endless march
Eternal truth proclaim;
The flowers God's love from day to day
In gentlest accents name;
The skies for burdened hearts and faint
A code of Faith prepare;
What tempest ever left the heaven
Without a blue spot there?

My native isle! my native isle!
In sunnier climes I've strayed,
But better love thy pebbled beach
And lonely forest glade,
Where low winds stir with fragrant breath
The purple violet's head,
And the star-grass in the early spring
Peeps from the sear leaf's bed.

I would no more of tears and strife
Might on thee ever meet,
But when against the tide of years
This heart has ceased to beat,
Where the green weeping willows bend
I fain would go to rest,
Where waters lave, and winds may sweep
Above my peaceful breast.

"A DREAM THAT WAS NOT ALL A DREAM."

Through the half-curtained window stole
An autumn sunset's glow,
As languid on my couch I lay
With pulses weak and low.

And then methought a presence stood
With shining feet and fair,
Amid the waves of golden light
That rippled through the air;

And laid upon my heaving breast
With earnest glance and true,
A babe whose pure and gentle brow
No shade of sorrow knew.

A solemn joy was in my heart —
Immortal life was given
To earth, upon her battle-field
To discipline for Heaven.

Strange music thrilled the quiet room
An unseen host were nigh,
Who left the infant pilgrim at
The threshold of our sky.

A new, strange love woke in my heart,
Defying all control,
As on the soft air rose and fell
That birth-hymn for a soul.

And now again the autumn skies
As on that evening shine,
When from a trance of agony
I woke to joy divine :

That boundless love is in my heart,
That birth-hymn on the air ;
I clasp in mine with grateful faith
A tiny hand in prayer :

And bless the God who guides my way
That 'mid this world so wide
I day by day am walking with
An angel by my side,

HOWE, JULIA WARD,

WIFE of Dr. S. G. Howe of Boston, the celebrated philanthropist, is a daughter of Samuel Ward of New York. That she is thoroughly educated and accomplished, her poems, that is the few she has given to the public, are sufficient to prove. Purity, elevation of thought, and felicity of expression, mark all her writings. She is, as we might judge, 'to the manner born,' for her mother, Mrs. Ward, was also a woman of poetic genius.

A MOTHER'S FEARS.

I am one who holds a treasure,
A gem of wondrous cost ;
But I mar my heart's deep pleasure
With the fear it may be lost.

God gives not many mothers
So fair a child as thou,
And those he gives to others
In death are oft laid low

I, too, might know that sorrow,
To stand by thy dying bed,
And wish each weary morrow
Only that I were dead.

Oh! would that I could hear thee,
As I bore thee 'neath my heart,
And every sorrow spare thee,
And bid each pain depart !

Tell me some act of merit
By which I may deserve
To hold the angel spirit,
And its sweet life preserve.

When I watch the little creature,
If tears of rapture flow —
If I worship each fair feature —
All mothers would do so.

And if I fain would shield her
From suffering, on my breast,
Strive every joy to yield her,
T is thus that I am blest.

Oh! for some heavenly token,
By which I may be sure
The vase shall not be broken —
Dispersed the essence pure !

Then spake the Angel of Mothers
To me, in gentle tone :
" Be kind to the children of others,
And thus deserve thine own.

J.

JAMES, MARIA,

Is the daughter of a Welsh emigrant, who came to America in the early part of this century, when his daughter was about seven years old, and settled in the northern part of the state of New York. Maria James received a very slight education, but from her earliest youth evinced a poetical talent very remarkable in a person circumstanced as she was; occupying generally the position of a nursery-maid, or servant in families in the towns of that state. Her poems, with a preface by Alonzo Potter, D. D., now Bishop of Pennsylvania, were published in 1839.

JACOBS, SARAH S.,

Is a native of Rhode Island, but resides at present in Cambridgeport, Massachusetts. Her poems, by which she made herself known to the reading public, bear the stamp of originality and beauty in no ordinary degree. She possesses evidently powers which she has not yet fully unfolded to the world.

K.

KINNEY, E. C.,

Was born and educated in the city of New York. Her maiden name was Dodge. She was married to Mr. William B. Kinney, editor of the Newark Daily Advertiser. Mrs. Kinney wrote almost from her childhood, and her productions were thrown off with the greatest ease; yet she always shrank from publicity, and her early efforts appeared under an assumed name. Her poems have been published principally in the Knickerbocker and Graham's Magazine; and have never yet been collected. All the qualities which mark a ready writer appear in her poems; ease, melody, and grace; if they are wanting in thought and strength, the glimpses of those powers that appear in her writings, give evidence that the author has higher capabilities than she has yet unfolded to the world.

CULTIVATION.

Weeds grow unasked, and even some sweet flowers
Spontaneous give their fragrance to the air,
And bloom on hills, in vales, and everywhere —
As shines the sun, or fall the summer showers —
But wither while our lips pronounce them fair!
Flowers of more worth repay alone the care,
The nurture, and the hopes, of watchful hours;
While plants most cultured have most lasting powers
So, flowers of genius that will longest live,
Spring not in Mind's uncultivated soil,
But are the birth of time, and mental toil,
And all the culture Learning's hand can give:
Fancies like wild flowers, in a night may grow;
But thoughts are plants whose stately growth is slow.

THE QUAKERESS BRIDE.

The building was humble, yet sacred to One
Who heeds the deep worship that utters no tone;
Whose presence is not to the temple confined,
But dwells with the contrite and lowly of mind.
"T was there all unveiled, save by modesty, stood
The Quakeress bride in her pure satin hood;
Her charms unadorned by the garland or gem,
Yet fair as the lily just plucked from its stem.
A tear glistened bright in her dark, shaded eye,
And her bosom half uttered a tremulous sigh,
As the hand she had pledged was confidently given,
And the low-murmured accents recorded in heaven.

L.

LARCOM, LUCY,

Was born in Massachusetts. While she was employed as an operative at Lowell, she first began to write, and her earliest effusions, both in prose and verse, appeared in "The Lowell Offering," and were received with particular favour. At present, Miss Larcom is employed as a teacher in Illinois.

LAWSON, MARY LOCKHART,

Is of Scotch extraction, but was born and resides in Philadelphia. She has written poems for the various periodicals that do honour both to her intellect and her heart.

LEE, ELEANOR PERCY,

DAUGHTER of Judge Ware, of Mississippi, and sister of Mrs. Catharine Warfield, married Mr. Lee, of Mississippi. She, together with her sister, has published two volumes of poetry, one entitled, "Wife of Leon, and other Poems;" and the other, "The Indian Chamber, and other Poems."

LITTLE, SOPHIA L.,

DAUGHTER of Hon. Asher Robbins, of Rhode Island, was born at Newport, in 1799. In 1824, she married Mr. William Little, of Boston, where Mrs. Little has since resided. She is a poetess of much merit. Her principal works are, "The Last days of Jesus;" "The Annunciation and Birth of Jesus, and the Resurrection;" "The Betrothed;" and "The Branded Hand," besides many fugitive poems. She has also written a prose work called "The Pilgrim's Progress in the Last Days."

LOCKE, JANE E.,

Is a native of Massachusetts. Her poems first appeared in the American Ladies' Magazine, about 1830. Since then she has written for several periodicals, and also published a volume of miscellaneous poems. The book met with much favour from the many friends of the author, and her talents have availed to benefit herself and her family. Besides poetry, Mrs. Locke has written some interesting prose papers, and shows an earnest desire to do good in all her productions. She resides in Lowell.

LOWELL, MARIA,

By birth Miss White, is a native of Watertown, Massachusetts. In 1844, she was married to the well-known poet, James Russell Lowell, and by her own writings has shown that she is truly his "sister spirit." There is great tenderness of feeling, and simplicity, in all the productions of her pen; and her household lyrics are full of pathos and beauty. The poetical genius of women has displayed its best powers when employed, as it usually is, to exalt religious hopes, hallow domestic feelings, and beautify the humble duties of life.

THE MORNING-GLORY.

We wreathed about our darling's head
The morning-glory bright;
Her little face looked out beneath,
So full of life and light,
So lit as with a sunrise,
That we could only say,
"She is the morning-glory true,
And her poor types are they."

So always from that happy time
We called her by their name,
And very fitting did it seem—
For, sure as morning came,
Behind her cradle bars she smiled
To catch the first faint ray,
As from the trellis smiles the flower
And opens to the day.

But not so beautiful they rear
Their airy cups of blue,
As turned her sweet eyes to the light,
Brimmed with sleep's tender dew;
And not so close their tendrils fine
Round their supports are thrown,
As those dear arms whose outstretched plea
Clasped all hearts to her own.

We used to think how she had come,
Even as comes the flower,
The last and perfect added gift
To crown love's morning hour
And how in her was imaged forth
The love we could not say,
As on the little dewdrops round
Shines back the heart of day.

We never could have thought, O God,
That she must wither up,
Almost before a day was flown,
Like the morning-glory's cup;
We never thought to see her droop
Her fair and noble head,
Till she lay stretched before our eyes,
Wilted, and cold, and dead!

The morning-glory's blossoming
Will soon be coming round:
We see their rows of heart-shaped leaves
Upspringing from the ground;
The tender things the winter killed
Renew again their birth,
But the glory of our morning
Has passed away from earth.

Oh, Earth! in vain our aching eyes
Stretch over thy green plain!
Too harsh thy dews, too gross thine air
Her spirit to sustain:
But up in groves of paradise
Full surely we shall see
Our morning-glory beautiful
Twine round our dear Lord's knee.

M.

MAY, CAROLINE,

Is daughter of the Rev. Edward Harrison May, of New York. For some time she published her poems anonymously, or under the signature of Caromaia. In 1848, she edited a work called, "Specimens of the American Female Poets," and evinced much taste and true poetical feeling in the selections she made. In 1850, there appeared another volume of selections by the same author, entitled "Treasured Thoughts from Favourite Authors." This work is worthy its name; its perusal will convince the reader of the judgment and discrimination of the compiler. It is full of lofty and refined sentiments and noble truths, selected from the best English classics.

LILIES.

Every flower is sweet to me —
The rose and violet,
The pink, the daisy, and sweet pea,
Heart's-ease and mignonette,
And hyacinths and daffodillies:
But sweetest are the spotless lilies

I know not what the lilies were
That grew in ancient times —
When Jesus walked with children fair,
Through groves of eastern climes,
And made each flower, as he passed by it,
A type of faith, content, and quiet.

But they were not more pure and bright
Than those our gardens show;
Or those that shed their silver light,
Where the dark waters flow;
Or those that hide in woodland alley,
The fragrant lilies of the valley.

And I, in each of them, would see
Some lesson for my youth:
The loveliness of purity,
The stateliness of truth,
Whene'er I look upon the lustre
Of those that in the garden cluster.

Patience and hope, that keep the soul
Unruffled and secure,
Though floods of grief beneath it roll,
I learn, when calm and pure
I see the floating water-lily,
Gleam amid shadows dark and chilly.

And when the fragrance that ascends,
Shows where its lovely face
The lily of the valley bends,
I think of that sweet grace,
Which sheds within the spirit lowly,
A rest, like heaven's, so safe and holy.

THOUGHT.

So truly, faithfully, my heart is thine,
Dear Thought, that when I am debarred from thee
By the vain tumult of vain company;
And when it seems to be the fixed design
Of heedless hearts, who never can incline
Themselves to seek thy rich though hidden charms,
To keep me daily from thy outstretched arms —
My soul sinks faint within me, and I pine
As lover pines when from his love apart,
Who, after having been long loved, long sought,
At length has given to his persuasive art
Her generous soul with hope and fear full fraught:
For thou'rt the honoured mistress of my heart,
Pure, quiet, beautiful, beloved Thought!

"MAY, EDITH,"

Is the nomme de plume of one of the most youthful and most promising poets of America; she was born in Philadelphia, but for the last four years has resided at Montrose, a place in a secluded but most beautiful part of Pennsylvania. It is now about three or four years since her first poems appeared, and they displayed a degree of thought, finish and beauty so unusual in the first attempts of writers, that they immediately commanded attention, and "Edith May" is now one of the best known of the many young aspirants for fame in this country. Her writings are about to be collected and published in one volume.

PRAYER.

I have a thought of one who drawing close
Over her brow the sackcloth, in its folds
Crouched, shutting out from her refusing eyes
God's gift of sunshine. While the all-pitying skies
Wooded her with light she would not look upon;
While earth entreated her, and passing winds
Plucked at her garments, and around her flung
Invisible arms, light, urgent, clasping arms,
Her heart made answer — I have lain so long
On thy cold breast, Despair, did I arise
I should reel wildly, staggering with cramped limbs,
Through the white, glaring sunshine. Hide me, night!
Lest the full glories of the universe
Smite me with blindness, and exulting earth
Under the blue triumphal arch of Heaven
Victoriously passing, blast my sense
With her insulting gladness! Once I prayed.
Once, when dismay, want, guilt, pressed me so close
I faced them in mere madness, and beholding,
From mine appalled heart sent up a shriek
That must have pierced the hollow ear of space,
Startling the angels, holding in suspense,
Awhile, the eternal harmonies. Vain heart!
Could the mute prayer that on its fiery track
Followed in trembling haste, prevail so far?
Amid the roll of twice ten thousand harps
Struck by white-handed seraphim, the voice
Of that unfathomed sea of human woe,
Making perpetual moan about His throne,
And surging to His footstool, dost thou dream
That its weak cry rose audibly?

Did sleep

On her imploring senses lightly rest
His hand in benediction? The still air
To her astonished gaze grew all instinct,
Moted with airy forms forever drawn
Up by some genial influence. With bent heads,
With hands clasped mutely, and looks downward dropped,
Else searching space, onward they pressed, and drew
Her wrapt soul with them. Tears and sighs fell thick,
Mixed with low, broken murmurs, and a sound,
Distinct, of music that flowed clearly on,
Like a bright singing stream that lifts its voice
Amid the mourning of sere autumn boughs
Bent with wet leaves and rain. The dense, dull air
As 'twere a veil they parted, and it lay
Above the earth like the dusk cloud that hangs
Over some populous mart. Yet upward still
Through that black space of which the hue of night
Is a pale mock; and she who fled with them
Whither she questioned not, from that great height
Back glancing, saw the universe as one
Who looking from a mountain top beholds
Faint, clustering lamps that twinkling through the gloom
Mark where a city stands. And upward still Till through the cloaking dark a sword of light
Flashed suddenly! Then over, and around
There shined a brightness of ten thousand suns
All concentrate, and her scared spirit stood
In its full courts of Heaven. She might not look
On the great glory, but the seraphim
That leant upon their harps forever there

Turned with bright, solemn faces, lost, transfused
 Into one rapturous thought. She only saw
 How all the assembled prayers of all the worlds
 Entreated, silent. Various their guise;
 Some with pure eyes uplift that dared to look
 Straight on Divinity, and some, with dust
 On their pale foreheads. There were infant prayers
 Crowned with faint halos; saintly prayers that might
 But for some traces of forgotten tears,
 Have swelled the ranks of Heaven. While yet she looked
 On the pale verge of light, there stood a Form
 Forlorn, close mantled, that with tottering feet Crept nearer. Hers! she knew it well. Her heart
 Shrank with a deadly fear. Oh God, the prayer
 That on the steps of the wild shriek that bore
 Woe, horror, and defiance up to Heaven
 Followed with faint entreaty! That weak moan:
 That mute, despairing thing that from her heart
 Scarce struggled to her lips, and there fell prone
 As one across a threshold. Staggering on,
 With its pale hands uplift, closer it drew,
 And while she looked to see it thrust without
 Into surrounding darkness, rapt and calm
 Stood the ranked angels. Near, oh God, it came!
 Then with the mien of her who touched His robe
 When the crowd pressed Him, springing to the throne
 With a low cry, fell prostrate.

In their sheaths,
 Why slept the keen swords of the cherubim?
 Lo! every knee was bowed; round every brow
 There bloomed fresh amaranth; from every lip
 Burst such transcendent melody, the stars
 Grew musical with its echoes, and dull earth
 Dreamed of it in her slumbers! Last of all
 Rose that pale Form and cast the mantle back,
 And drank in the pure light with steadfast eyes,
 And showed God's seal, that, stamped upon its brow,
 Burned like a star.

There was great joy in Heaven.

FROST PICTURES.

When, like a sullen exile driven forth,
 Southward, December drags his icy chain,
 He graves fair pictures of his native North
 On the crisp window-pane.

So some pale captive blurs with lips unshorn
 The latticed glass, and shapes rude outlines there,
 With listless finger, and a look forlorn,
 Cheating his dull despair.

The fairy fragments of some Arctic scene
 I see to-night; blank wastes of polar snow,
 Ice-laden boughs, and feathery pines that lean
 Over ravines below.

Black frozen lakes, and icy peaks blown bare.
 Break the white surface of the crusted pane;
 And spear-like leaves, long ferns, and blossoms fair,
 Linked in a silvery chain.

Draw me, I pray thee, by this slender thread;
 Fancy, thou sorceress, bending vision-wrought
 O'er that dim well perpetually fed
 By the clear springs of thought!

Northward I turn, and tread those dreary strands,
 Lakes where the wild-fowl breed, the swan abides;
 Shores where the white fox, burrowing in the sands,
 Harks to the droning tides.

And seas where, drifting on a raft of ice,
 The she-bear rears her young, and cliffs so high
 The dark-winged birds that emulate their rise
 Melt through the pale blue sky.

There, all night long, with far-diverging rays,
 And stalking shades, the red Aurora's glow;
 From the keen heaven, meek suns with pallid blaze
 Light up the Arctic snow

Guide me, I pray, along those waves remote,
 That deep unstartled from its primal rest;
 Some errant sail, the fisher's lone light boat,
 Borne waif-like on its breast!

Lead me, I pray, where never shall the keel
 Brake the dull ripples throbbing to their caves,
 Where the mailed glacier with his armed heel
 Spurs the resisting waves!

Paint me, I pray, the phantom hosts that hold
 Celestial tourneys when the midnight calls;
 On airy steeds, with lances bright and bold,
 Storming her ancient halls!

Yet, while I look the magic picture fades;
 Melts the bright tracery from the frosted pane;
 Trees, vales, and cliffs, in sparkling snows arrayed
 Dissolve in silvery rain.

Without, the day's pale glories sink and swell
 Over the black rise of yon wooded height;
 The moon's thin crescent, like a stranded shell,
 Left on the shores of night.

Hark! how the north wind, with a hasty hand
 Rattling my casement, frames his mystic rhyme.
 House thee, rude minstrel, chanting through the land
 Runes of the olden time!

M'CARTEE, JESSIE G.,

WIFE of the Rev. Dr. McCartee, Minister of the Reformed Dutch Church in Goshen, N. Y., is the daughter of Divie Bethune, of New York, and the granddaughter of Isabella Graham, so well-known for her piety and benevolence. Her poems have appeared principally in the different magazines and annals of the day. She has never made a collection of them, though they are fully worthy of it, displaying as they do, a cultivated and refined mind, a heart full of sympathy and elevated by strong religious feeling, and an easy and harmonious flow of versification.

MEIGS, MARY NOEL,

BETTER known as M. N. M., under which initials her writings were published for a long time, is a native of New York. Her maiden name was Bleecker. In 1834, she was married to Mr. Pierre F. McDonald, who died in 1844. During the succeeding year, she published a volume called "Poems by M. N. M." Her other works were several juvenile books, and articles both in prose and poetry for the periodicals. In 1848, she was married a second time, to Mr. Meigs, of New York.

N.

NICHOLS, REBECCA S.,

Was born in Greenwich, New Jersey. Her father was Dr. Reed of that place, who afterwards removed to Louisville, Kentucky, where Miss Reed was married to Mr. W. Nichols. In 1839, Mr. Nichols removed with his family to Cincinnati, where they now reside. Mrs. Nichols began her career as a poetess at a very early age. Her first articles were published under the signature of "Ellen," but latterly she writes under her own name, and that of "Kate Cleveland." At one time she was the editress of a periodical called "The Guest," to which she herself was the principal ornament. In 1844, Mrs. Nichols published a work called "Bernice, or the curse of Minna, and other Poems."

O.

OLIVER, SOPHIA HELEN,

Is a native of Lexington, Kentucky, where she was born in 1811. At the age of twenty-six she was married to Dr. Oliver of Louisville; and in 1842, her husband being appointed a professor in one of the medical colleges of Cincinnati, she accompanied him to that city, where she now resides. She is known as a writer only by her poems, which are easy and graceful, and flow with a natural harmony that can afford to slight some of the rules of art.

P.

PEABODY, ELIZABETH PALMER,

DAUGHTER of Dr. N. Peabody, is descended on the mother's side from the two Joseph Palmers, one of whom was President and the other Secretary of the first Provincial Congress that assembled in Massachusetts to consider British wrongs; and both of whom, the father as Brigadier-General, the son as his aid, were engaged in the battle of Lexington. Miss Peabody was born May 16th, 1804, at Billerica, and lived in her early life in Salem, Mass., but, since 1822, has resided principally in Boston, where she has been engaged in education and literary pursuits. She first published a "Key to Hebrew History;" and a "Key to Grecian History;" she next wrote the "Records of a School," which went into the second edition: and also contributed to the early numbers of the "Journal of Education;" to the "Christian Examiner" of 1834, in which are some articles on the "Spirit of the Hebrew Scriptures;" and to the "Dial," in which she wrote the articles on Socialism. In 1849, Miss Peabody edited "The Æsthetic Papers," to which she contributed an article "On the Dorian Culture," more elaborate than anything else she has written; and a paper upon "The Significance of the Alphabet," besides several shorter articles and poems. Her latest work is a school-book, entitled the "Polish-American System of Chronology," being a modified translation of General Bem's method of teaching history on a Chronological System.

Miss Peabody's writings are of a class unusual to her sex. They evince great learning and research, a mind free from the trammels of prejudice, and capable of judging for itself on whatever subject its attention may be turned, one whose aim is high — no less than the progressive improvement of her race, and who presses forward to the end she has in view, with an earnestness and energy proportioned to its importance. Her poems are harmonious, and show more thought than is usually seen in such occasional effusions. Still we look for a greater work from her pen than any she has yet sent forth. Miss Peabody is of the transcendental school of writers, though not among the mystics. We do not endorse all her ideas, but only commend her philanthropic spirit.

PHILLIPS, ANNA H.,

Is one of the numerous band of young writers of whom our country may well be proud. She is a native of Lynn, Massachusetts; and hitherto has written only under the name of "Helen Irving."

PINDAR, SUSAN,

Is the daughter of Charles Pindar, a Russian by birth, and holding for a time the appointment of Russian Consul to Florida. She was born at a place then called "Pindar's Vale," and adjoining the present residence of Washington Irving. Miss Pindar was early left an orphan, and by the subsequent death of her brothers, almost without a relative in this country. Her first productions appeared in the Knickerbocker; in 1849, she published a juvenile book entitled "Fireside Fairies," and in 1850, another called "Midsummer Lays." Her poems have never been collected in a volume, though they seem truly worthy of such an attempt at preservation.

THE SHADED FLOWER.

From a dark cloud's breast a raindrop fell,
In a grateful summer shower,
Through the tangled leaves of a vine-clad dell
Till it rested at last in the opening bell
Of a little shaded flower.

Then the sun looked forth, and his glad'ning beams
Soon drank the shower-dew up,
He smiled on the mountain, the valley, and stream,
But he did not kiss with his warm bright gleams,
The drop in the blossom's cap.

"How sad is my fate," the floweret sighed
With the glittering weight oppressed,—
"My sisters smile in their graceful pride,
While I am condemned this load to hide,
Within my trembling breast."

Then she bowed her head on her fragile stem
And slept through the long, still night,
But when she awoke, the prisoned gem
Shone like a glorious diadem,
As it flashed in the morning light.

The scorching sun at the noontide hour,
Looked down on the blossoms gay,
They drooped, and paled, 'neath his withering power
All save the little shaded flower,
And she quailed not before his ray.

Then to glisten afar, in the rainbow's dye,
He bade the drop depart,—
But the flower looked up with a trusting eye.
Though the drop no more in her breast might be,
It had freshened the life at her heart.

And is it not thus in adversity's hour,
When the soul is with grief oppressed
Our spirits bow 'neath misfortune's power
And we nurse like the little shaded flower
A sorrow in the breast?

And may we not hope, when our grief is fled,
That a stronger faith will be given,
And the tears which our burdened hearts have shed
Shall form when the night of gloom is sped
A rainbow of hope in Heaven?

S.

SAWYER, CAROLINE M.,

WAS born in 1812, in Newton, Mass. Her maiden name was Fisher. In 1832, she was married to the Rev. Dr. Sawyer, a pastor over one of the Universalist churches in New York, where they resided until 1847, when they removed to Clinton in the same state, where Dr. Sawyer was chosen President of the Universalist Seminary. Although Mrs. Sawyer did not publish till after her marriage, she began to write both tales and poems at a very early age; by her writings we can readily perceive that her education has been thorough and extensive, and that the author possesses a mind of much power. Her translations from the German are made with faithfulness and spirit, and her original poems especially are marked by deep thought and command of language.

PEBBLES.

Give me the pebble, little one, that I
To yon bright pool may hurtle it away;
Look! how 't has changed the azure wave to grey,
And biotted out the image of the sky!
So, when our spirits calm and placid lie —
When all the passions of the bosom sleep,
And from its stirless and unruffled deep
Beams up a heaven as bright as that on high,
Some pebble — envy, jealousy, misdoubt —
Dashed in our bosom's slumbering waves to jar,
Will cloud the mirrored surface of the soul,
And blot its heaven of joy and beauty out.
Sin! fling no pebble in my soul, to mar
Its solemn depths, and o'er it clouds to roll!

SHINDLER, MARY B.,

WAS born on the 15th of February, 1810, in Beaufort, S. C., where her father, the Rev. B. M. Palmer, was pastor of an Independent or Congregational church. When she was about three years old, her father removed to Charleston, S. C., his native place, where he remained for the succeeding twenty-five years. Here Miss Palmer enjoyed the best advantages of education, being placed at an early age under the care of the Misses Ramsay, daughters of the historian; and sent, when she became old enough, to some of the best northern schools. Her poetical talents were very early developed, her first piece of poetry having been written at the age of ten; soon after her final return from school, some of her productions fell into the hands of a friend, who showed them to Mrs. Gilman, at that time editress of the juvenile periodical called the Rose-Bud; she inserted these poems, and encouraged Miss Palmer to write; but it was not till years after, when she had drunk deeply of the bitter waters of affliction, that her heart poured out its sorrows through her pen.

In June, 1835, Miss Palmer was married to Mr. Charles E. Dana, and in 1837, he, with his family, consisting of his wife and child, a boy of about two years of age, removed to Bloomington, Iowa. Here the husband and child died within two days of each other, and Mrs. Dana was left alone in a land of strangers. In October of the same year she returned to her parents; and it was during her residence with them that the greater part of her works was written. These were composed, not with any view to publication, but as she herself says in one of her letters, "Burning thoughts were struggling within my breast, and I must give them utterance. My friends encouraged me to write, because they thought that the expression of my grief would relieve me, and so, in truth, it did. But when I had accumulated a mass of manuscripts, they urged me to their publication, giving as a reason, that what had comforted me in my sore extremity, might comfort other afflicted ones, and it was with this hope and this idea, that I first appeared before the public."

In 1840, Mrs. Dana's first work, "The Southern Harp," was published by Parker & Ditson, of Boston, and met with the greatest success; in 1841, she published a volume called "The Parted Family, and other poems;" and also "The Northern Harp." All of these works passed through several editions. In 1843, she published "Charles Morton, or the Young Patriot, a tale of the American Revolution;" and during the next two or three years, two prose tales written for seamen, one called "The Young Sailor," and the other "Forecastle Tom." About 1844, Mrs. Dana's religious views underwent a great change. She had been always much troubled about some of the Calvinistic doctrines, and inclined to question the soundness of their dogmas. One doubt brought on another, till she finally became a Unitarian. This caused a great commotion among her friends; letters poured in upon her from all quarters, and finally she felt herself driven to the necessity of replying publicly to some of the communications. In 1845, her largest prose work, entitled "Letters to Relatives and Friends" &c. was published in Boston.

Soon after her return home, Mrs. Dana removed with her parents to Orangeburg, a village about eighty miles from Charleston. Here her parents both died, in the summer of 1847, while she was absent on a tour to the North, undertaken on account of her health. Mrs. Dana, however, still continued to reside there, and in May, 1848, she was married to the Rev. Robert D. Shindler, a clergyman of the Episcopal Church, to which church she was united some months after her marriage. In 1850, Mr. and Mrs. Shindler removed to Upper Marlboro, Md., where they are at present residing.

Besides the works already mentioned, Mrs. Shindler has written many articles for Magazines and Reviews; but another work from her pen is greatly needed, a refutation of her arguments in favour of Unitarianism, which were esteemed the best that had ever been put forth in a popular form; as Mrs. Shindler has now relinquished that belief, her own searching mind must have detected the fallacies of its doctrines. Her style is well suited to these dissertations. Clear, candid and courteous in her expressions of opinion, she never wounds the feelings of an opponent, while her earnest search after truth attracts those who feel little interest in the subject.

SMITH, EMMELINE S.,

By birth Miss Sherman, is a native of New Baltimore, New York. In 1836, she was married, and removed to the city of New York, where she now resides. In 1847, Mrs. Smith published a work called "The Fairy's Search, and other Poems." Besides this, she has written for several of the principal periodicals. A vein of cheerful content and of reverent piety runs through all her poems, which are also full of felicitous expressions and graceful harmony.

SPROAT, ELIZA S.,

Was born and still resides in Philadelphia. She has written but little for publication, and only in poetry; yet all her productions that have appeared show so much ease and grace, that doubtless they form but a small part of her actual writings. She is a Teacher in one of the public schools, and holds a high place in her profession, the next in importance to that of mother. The office of Teacher is peculiarly adapted to improve female talent; the young lady who is distinguished as a good instructress, is in the sure way to perfect her own education.

STOWE, HARRIET BEECHER,

Was born in Litchfield, Connecticut. Daughter of the Rev. Dr. Beecher, now of Cincinnati, and sister of Miss Catharine Beecher, whose sketch we have given, the subject of our brief notice could hardly fail of enjoying great advantages of moral as well as intellectual culture. From the age of fifteen till her marriage, Miss Harriet Beecher was associated with her sister in the cares of a large female seminary. Teaching is an excellent discipline, both of the heart and mind, of a young lady; those are fortunate who, either from necessity or from a wish to do good, pass some intervening years in this praiseworthy profession before they take on themselves the responsibilities of a household of their own. Miss Harriet Beecher was thus fitted to be a congenial companion of the Rev. Calvin E. Stowe, whom she married when about twenty-one. Her husband is a man of profound learning, then the Professor of Languages and Biblical Literature in the Divinity School at Cincinnati; he is now one of the professors in Brunswick College, Maine. Mrs. Stowe has been the model of a good wife and mother; of her seven children six are living, so that the greater portion of her time, thoughts, and strength has been spent in the important duties of the family. Yet she has found time to contribute to several periodicals. Her writings are deservedly admired for their sprightly vivacity and artistic finish combined with moral sentiments of the loftiest stamp, expressed in such a familiar way, that it makes wisdom seem like a pleasant friend, instead of a grave Mentor. None of our female writers excel Mrs. Stowe in the art of entertaining her readers; the only regret is, that she does not write more. "The May-Flower," a collection of her stories, was published in 1849, and has, of course been very popular.

From "The Tea-Rose."

There it stood, in its little green vase, on a light ebony stand, in the window of the drawing-room. The rich satin curtains, with their costly fringes, swept down on either side of it, and around it glittered every rare and fanciful trifle which wealth can offer to luxury, and yet that simple rose was the fairest of them all. So pure it looked, its white leaves just touched with that delicious creamy tint peculiar to its kind; its cup so full, so perfect; its head bending, as if it were sinking and melting away in its own richness—oh! when did ever man make any thing to equal the living, perfect flower!

But the sunlight that streamed through the window revealed something fairer than the rose—a young lady reclining on an ottoman, who was thus addressed by her livelier cousin: "I say, cousin, I have been thinking what you are to do with your pet rose when you go to New York; as, to our consternation, you are determined to do. You know it would be a sad pity to leave it with such a scatter-brain as I am. I love flowers, indeed; that is, I like a regular bouquet, cut off and tied up, to carry to a party; but as to all this tending and fussing which is needful to keep them growing, I have no gifts in that line."

"Make yourself easy as to that, Kate," said Florence, with a smile; "I have no intention of calling upon your talents; I have an asylum in view for my favourite."

"Oh, then, you know just what I was going to say. Mrs. Marshall, I presume, has been speaking to you; she was here yesterday, and I was quite pathetic upon the subject; telling her the loss your favourite would sustain, and so forth; and she said how delighted she would be to have it in her greenhouse; it is in such a fine state now, so full of buds. I told her I knew you would like to give it to her; you are so fond of Mrs. Marshall, you know."

"Now, Kate, I am sorry, but I have otherwise engaged it."

"Who can it be to? you have so few intimates here."

"Oh, it is only one of my odd fancies."

"But do tell me, Florence."

"Well, cousin, you know the little pale girl to whom we give sewing?"

"What! little Mary Stephens? How absurd, Florence! This is just another of your motherly, old-maidish ways; dressing dolls for poor children, making bonnets, and knitting socks for all the little dirty babies in the neighbourhood. I do believe you have made more calls in those two vile, ill-smelling alleys behind our house, than ever you have in Chestnut-Street, though you know everybody is half-dying to see you; and now, to crown all, you must give this choice little bijou to a seamstress girl, when one of your most intimate friends, in your own class, would value it so highly. What in the world can people in their circumstances want with flowers?"

"Just the same as I do," replied Florence, calmly. "Have you not noticed that the little girl never comes here without looking wistfully at the opening buds? And don't you remember, the other morning she asked me so prettily if I would let her mother come and see it, she was so fond of flowers?"

"But, Florence, only think of this rare flower standing on a table with ham, eggs, cheese, and flour, and stifled in that close little room where Mrs. Stephens and her daughter manage to wash, iron, and cook."

"Well, Kate, and if I were obliged to live in one coarse room, and wash, and iron, and cook, as you say; if I had to spend every moment of my time in toil, with no prospect from my window but a brick wall and dirty lane, such a flower as this would be untold enjoyment to me."

"Pshaw, Florence; all sentiment! Poor people have no time to be sentimental. Besides, I do n't believe it will grow with them; it is a greenhouse flower, and used to delicate living."

"Oh, as to that, a flower never inquires whether its owner is rich or poor; and Mrs. Stephens, whatever else she has not, has sunshine of as good quality as this that streams through our window. The beautiful things that God makes are his gifts to all alike. You will see that my fair rose will be as well and cheerful in Mrs. Stephens' room as in ours."

"Well, after all, how odd! When one gives to poor people, one wants to give them something useful—a bushel of potatoes, a ham, and such things."

"Why, certainly, potatoes and ham must be supplied; but, having ministered to the first and most craving wants, why not add any other little pleasures or gratifications we may have it in our power to bestow? I know there are many of the poor who have fine feeling and a keen sense of the beautiful, which rusts out and dies because they are too hard pressed to procure 'it any gratification. Poor Mrs. Stephens, for example; I know she would enjoy birds, and flowers, and music, as much as I do. I have seen her eye light up as she looked upon these things in our drawing-room, and yet not one beautiful thing can she command. From necessity, her room, her clothing, all she has, must be coarse and plain. You should have seen the almost rapture she and Mary felt when I offered them my rose."

"Dear me! all this may be true, but I never thought of it before. I never thought that these hard-working people had any ideas of taste!"

"Then why do you see the geranium or rose so carefully nursed in the old cracked teapot in the poorest room, or the morning-glory planted in a box and twined about the window? Do not these show that the human heart yearns for the beautiful in all ranks of life? You remember, Kate, how our washerwoman sat up a whole night, after a hard day's work, to make her first baby a pretty dress to be baptized in."

"Yes; and I remember how I laughed at you for making such a tasteful little cap for it."

"True, Katy, but I think the look of perfect delight with which the poor mother regarded her baby in its new dress and cap, was something quite worth creating; I do believe she could not have felt more grateful if I had sent her a barrel of flour."

"Well, I never thought before of giving any thing to the poor but what they really needed, and I have always been willing to do that when I could without going far out of my way."

"Ah! cousin, if our heavenly Father gave to us after this mode, we should have only coarse, shapeless piles of provisions lying about the world, instead of all this beautiful variety of trees, and fruits, and flowers."

"Well, well, cousin, I suppose you are right, but have mercy on my poor head; it is too small to hold so many new ideas all at once, so go on your own way;" and the little lady began practising a waltzing step before the glass with great satisfaction.

T.

TALLEY, SUSAN ARCHER,

Is a native of Virginia, and resides now near Richmond. Her mind was very early and remarkably developed, but at the age of nine she lost her hearing entirely. This, however, seems to have had little effect upon her mental faculties, and she became a writer when very young. Her poetry is remarkable for its melody as well as for its depth of feeling. Miss Talley is also an artist.

TUTHILL, CORNELIA,

Was born in New Haven, Connecticut. Her first book, "Wreaths and Branches for the Church," was written when she was quite young, almost a school-girl. It is a collection of tales illustrating the different festivals in the "Christian Year," and met with a very favourable reception. Her next work was entitled, "Christian Ornaments, or the Spirit of the Church." Not long after appeared three juvenile books called, "The Boy of Spirit;" "Where are we happiest;" and "Hurra for New England." About 1849, appeared "The Belle, the Blue, and the Bigot, or Three Fields of Woman's Influence." She is still a young writer, and as each successive work marks improvement in thought and style, we may hope for something from her pen, superior to any work that she has yet sent forth.

W.

WARFIELD, CATHARINE,

Who, with her sister, Mrs. Eleanor Lee, is favourably known as a poetess, is the daughter of the Hon. Nathaniel Ware of Mississippi. He afterwards removed to Cincinnati, where Miss Catharine Ware married Mr. Warfield of Lexington, Kentucky. In 1843, Mrs. Warfield and Mrs. Lee published a volume, entitled, "The Wife of Leon, and other Poems, by Two Sisters of the West;" and in 1846, she published another collection of their writings, called, "The Indian Chamber, and other Poems." Mrs. Warfield is also a prose writer; her articles, published anonymously in annuals and periodicals, show great power of imagination and ingenious constructive talents. She would doubtless succeed in novel-writing, if the genius of American authors had opportunities for culture, and incitements to exertion. An international copyright, checking the overflow of British republications, would give American writers a place in our own field of literature. Mrs. Warfield would then cultivate her fine talents more assiduously.

WELLS, ANNA MARIA,

Was born in Gloucester, Massachusetts. Her maiden name was Foster. She began to write when young, but published little till after her marriage to Mr. Wells, in 1829. Her first work, "Poems and Juvenile Sketches," appeared in 1831, since which time she is only known in the literary world as a contributor to periodicals, nor does she often appear there, being engaged in a work of greater importance than writing poetry, namely, that of instruction. She has a seminary for young ladies, and deserves much honour for the manner in which she has sustained and educated her fatherless children.

NATURE.

Blest are the pure and simple hearts,
Unconsciously refined
By the free gifts that heaven imparts
Through nature to the mind.
Not all the pleasures wealth can buy,
Equal their happy destiny.
For them the Spring unfolds her flowers;
For them the Summer glows;
And Autumn's gold and purple bowers,
And Winter's stainless snows,
Come gifted with a charm to them
Richer than monarch's diadem.

WOODBIDGE, ABBY DWIGHT,

Is descended, on her father's side from Dr. Jonathan Edwards, and on her mother's from one of the first settlers of Hartford, Conn. She was born in Maine, but spent the greater part of her childhood and youth in Stockbridge, Mass., her father's native place. In 1836, Miss Woodbridge removed to Albany, and for nearly ten years was associated with Mr. Crittenden in the care of the Albany Female Academy. In May, 1846, she removed with the same gentleman to Brooklyn, when he undertook the charge of the Academy in that place, where she has since resided. Her occasional contributions to periodicals have made her name known to the readers of poetry; her writings are her amusement and relaxation in her hours of leisure, and show much purity of taste and ease of expression.

WOODMAN, HANNAH J.,

Is a native of Boston, Massachusetts. She has been for some years engaged in teaching, but in the intervals allowed by her avocation, she has devoted herself with success to literary pursuits. Her most important work is a volume entitled "The Casket of Gems." She has also written some smaller books.

BRITISH

ABDY, MRS.,

Has been hitherto principally known by her contributions to many of the Annuals and Magazines of the day. As a prose writer, her tales are natural and interesting; as a poet, many of her pieces are distinguished by a purity of diction and loftiness of sentiment, which leave her little behind the best writers among her sex. Her spiritual gifts are consecrated to the service of religion; and her verse is full of that serenity and cheerfulness which only a warm faith can inspire. Her only printed work is a "Volume of Poems," for private circulation. Mrs. Abdy has written several tales that would do credit to many of the high names in literature,—her moral is always sound and practical—her characters equally remote from insipidity or exaggeration, while a gentle humour pervades the whole. We would recommend "The Long Engagement," as a happy specimen of her manner.

THY MAIDEN NAME.

Thy Maiden Name — oh! how that word recalls
Thoughts of glad meetings and of happy faces;
I see thee bounding in thy father's halls,
Once more arrayed in girlhood's blooming graces.
Loose float thy nut-brown locks, thy step is light,
Thy harp is ever tuned to songs of gladness,
Kindred and friends extol thee with delight,
And none but lovers look on thee with sadness.

Thy Maiden Name — the scene is changed, and now
I see thee standing at the sacred altar;
Thy robes are spotless, gems are on thy brow,
Bright are thy blushes, thy faint accents falter;
Awhile the hazel eyes with tears are dim,
Leaving a home of kindness and protection,
But soon they smile with trusting faith on him
Who owns the treasure of thy young affection.

Thy Maiden Name — since thou that name resigned,
Time, which has somewhat dimmed thy sportive beauty
Has strengthened the firm qualities of mind
Befitting the calm sphere of matron duty;
Thy loved, thy chosen, estimates thy worth,
Nor do thy hopes e'er dwell upon another,
Save on the children who surround thy hearth,
Hearing sweet words of wisdom from their mother.

Thy Maiden Name — though soft its flowing sound,
Though high and pure its stainless reputation,
I will not mourn its loss — since thou hast found
A nobler duty, home, and designation:
Never, I feel, can England's downfall be,
Counting such wives and mothers in her pages;
Whose lives, displayed in their posterity,
Perchance may cast a light o'er future ages.

WHERE SHALL I DIE?

Where shall I die? — Shall Death's cold hand
Arrest my breath while dear ones stand
In silent watchful love, to shed
Their tears around my quiet bed?
Or, shall I meet my final doom
Far from my country and my home?
Lord, to Thy will I bend the knee;
Thou evermore hast cared for me.

How shall I die? — Shall Death's harsh yoke
Subdue me by a single stroke?
Or shall my fainting frame sustain
The tedious languishing of pain,
Sinking in weariness away,
Slowly and sadly, day by day?
Lord, I repose my cares on Thee;
Thou evermore hast cared for me.

When shall I die? — Shall Death's stern call
Soon come, my spirit to appal?
Or shall I live through circling years
A pilgrim in this vale of tears;
Surviving those I loved the best,
Who in the peaceful church-yard rest?
Lord! I await Thy wise decree;
Thou evermore hast cared for me.

Yet, oh, sustain me by Thy power!
Be with me in Life's parting hour:
Tell me of power and pardon won
Through the dear mercies of Thy Son;
Then should I feel resigned to go
From Life's brief joy and fleeting woe,
If I in death the Saviour see,
Who evermore hath cared for me.

AUSTIN, SARAH,

BELONGS to a family of literary celebrity, the Taylors of Norwich. She is perhaps better acquainted with German literature than any living writer not a native of Germany; and is also a classical scholar, and generally accomplished. She has made several successful translations, stamped by the approval of the original writers: some fragments from Goëthe — Ranke's "History of the Popes," — and "History of the Reformation." Her "Fragments from the German Prose Writers, illustrated with Biographical Notes," has attained considerable popularity, and gone through several editions.

B.

BRAY, MRS.,

Is a native of Devonshire. Her first husband was Charles Stothard, Esq., whom she greatly assisted in his antiquarian researches, and hence her knowledge of the arts and antiquities of her country. In 1836 she published a very amusing book, "Description of Devonshire, bordering on the Tamar and Tavy." In 1841 she produced an excellent description of her travels on the continent, — "The Mountains and Lakes of Switzerland," &c. She has besides published several novels, which are not without merit — but do not equal her graver works. "De Foix, or Sketches of Manners and Customs of the Fourteenth Century," "The Protestant," "Talba," "Trelawney of Trelawney." Her happiest literary effort is generally considered to be the "Traditions, Legends," &c. of Devonshire, in a series of letters to Southey, a book full of information and entertainment. Mrs. Bray has set an example or fashion of literature, in which ladies might excel, vastly to their own advantage as well as to the profit of society. Instead of vapid novels let us have vivid descriptions of natural scenery, and pictures of actual life.

BROOKE, CHARLOTTE,

Is a poetess of considerable reputation. Some of her poems have a sweetness of flow and delicacy of sentiment that seem made out of music, rather than for it. She seems only to have wanted some deep incitement, such as a sense of duty imparts to a woman's genius, in order to have excelled.

A LOVER'S LINES.

As the sweet blackberry's modest bloom
Fair-flowering, greets the sight;
Or strawberries, in their rich perfume,
Fragrance and bloom unite,
So this fair plant of tender youth
In outward charms can vie,
And, from within, the soul of truth,
Soft-beaming, fills her eye.

Pulse of my heart! — dear source of care,
Stol'n sighs, and love-breathed vows!
Sweeter than when, through scented air,
Gay bloom the apple-boughs!
With thee no days can winter seem,
Nor frost nor blast can chill;
Then the soft breeze, the cheering beam,
That keeps it summer still!

BULWER, LADY,

HAS gained an unfortunate celebrity both from unhappy family occurrences, and from the manner in which she has used her talents to avenge her real or fancied injuries. Her maiden name was Wheeler, only daughter of a respectable widow who resided in London. Miss Wheeler is represented to have been "a pale, slender, beautiful girl;" Edward Lytton Bulwer, fresh from college, saw and loved her; they were married against the wishes of his mother. The sequel is too well known to require detail — there was "incompatibility of temper" — unhappiness — separation. It was not till after this last event that Lady Bulwer became an author; we regret to say that her pen has not improved the respect we should like to entertain for one who has suffered. She is unquestionably a woman of talents; but her genius is not always well-directed. There is, throughout her works a sort of daring, a way of writing that seems like loud talking, when you are disposed to beg for less vociferation. "Chevely," her first novel, has some good scenes and fine passages, but it is a book of which we cannot approve; its tendency is wrong, its views of life unsound; still in reading it we feel disposed to make allowance; it appears like the outpourings of a sadly grieved spirit. Her next work, "The Bubble Family" is, in a literary point of view, a better book; yet it is disfigured by a coarse, sailor-like humour, such as would amuse coming from Captain Marryatt; from the pen of a lady it is sadly out of keeping. "Bianca Capello" shows great acquaintance with Italian learning, yet is rather a dull book. Lady Bulwer, however, displays so much information upon this interesting portion of Italian history, that we wonder she did not choose the simple vehicle of memoirs rather than this cumbrous romance. "The Peer's Daughters" is a later novel, and displays a minute knowledge of French history and manners, during the reign of Louis XV. The London critics have praised this work very highly. She has written other novels. With all Lady Bulwer's faults as a writer, she certainly excels the "immortal" Sir Edward in the main point—she is evidently a sincere and candid person; she is superior to cant, or to moralizing for effect.

BURY, LADY CHARLOTTE,

Was in her youth esteemed "The beauty of the Argyle family." As Lady Charlotte Campbell, she was one of the early friends of Sir Walter Scott; the notice of a beautiful young woman of the highest rank whose taste for literature enables her to appreciate genius, could not be otherwise than flattering to a young poet whose fame was yet to be established. Lady Charlotte after she became a widow was left in moderate circumstances with a family to advance: this state of things recommended her to an office in the household of the Princess of Wales, afterwards Queen Caroline, where she was admitted to the close intimacy of her mistress, from whom she received every sort of kindness, including large presents in money. She seems to have but indifferently requited these benefits, by a very scandalous publication, entitled, "Diary illustrative of the times of George IV." in which, all the foibles of the unfortunate Caroline of Brunswick are held up to ridicule. This book appeared anonymously, but as it underwent a most scathing review from Lord Brougham, in which he proclaimed the author, and as Lady Charlotte never offered any denial, there can be no doubt that she is the delinquent. She has written a great number of what are termed "Fashionable novels," which have not survived their little hour. Some of them, if that may be considered an honour, have been drawn from the oblivion into which they had sunk to be republished in America, in the twenty-five cent form, to augment the immense supply of steamboat and rail-car literature. We will add the names of some thus distinguished. "A Marriage in High Life;" "The Divorce;" "Love;" "The Separation;" "Flirtation;" &c.

CALDERON DE LA BARCA, FRANCES ERSKINE,

Is by birth a native of Scotland, her father being a descendant of the Earls of Buchan, and a grandson of the celebrated Colonel Gardiner mentioned in Scott's Waverley, who fell at Preston-Pans. The wife of Colonel Gardiner was Lady Frances Erskine, daughter of the Earl of Buchan, and famous in her time both for her beauty and her correspondence with Dr. Doddridge, as well as other celebrated divines. Mr. Inglis, the father of Madame de Calderon, lost his property, when she was quite young, and in consequence removed with his family to Normandy, where they resided for several years. After her father's decease, Miss Inglis accompanied her mother and the rest of the family to America. For six years Fanny Inglis assisted in the instruction of a school, established by her mother and sister in Boston, and was considered an excellent teacher. This portion of her history is a model for young ladies, who should cheerfully assist in sustaining themselves and others dear to them whenever such necessity occurs. Fanny Inglis while in adversity showed herself worthy of estimation and esteem, and the honour she gained is all the higher, because paid to her talents and virtues when the smiles of fortune were withdrawn.

In 1838, Miss Inglis was married to his Excellency Don Calderon de la Barca, a collateral descendant, we believe, of the great dramatist, Calderon, and went to reside at Washington. In 1840, M. de Calderon being appointed to Mexico, they passed two years there, and the experiences of those years have been recorded in the book which has rendered Madame Calderon so justly celebrated. Her work entitled "Life in Mexico," was published in 1843; it is written in a spirited, graphic, and fascinating style, and it is impossible not to feel that the brilliant pictures in it are drawn from nature; by reading it we obtain an insight into the ways of tropical life, and the habits of the Mexicans of all classes, for she observes every thing. The general accuracy of her account has never been questioned, while a slight vein of romance running through her description, has infused a spirit of life and vivacity into her book, making it a most delightful as well as useful work. In 1844, M. Calderon being again named minister to the United States, the family returned to Washington, where they have since resided. During the last seven years, after three years of devoted study, Madame Calderon has become a Roman Catholic, with a thorough conviction that she has embraced the true faith.

From "Life in Mexico."

OF THE WOMEN.

You ask me how Mexican women are educated. In answering you, I must put aside a few brilliant exceptions, and speak en masse, the most difficult thing in the world; for these exceptions are always rising up before me like accusing angels, and I begin to think of individuals, when I should keep to generalities. Generally speaking, then, the Mexican señoras and señoritas write, read and play a little, sew, and take care of their houses and children. When I say they read, I mean they know how to read; when I say they write, I do not mean they can always spell; and when I say they play, I do not assert that they have generally a knowledge of music. If we compare their education with that of the girls of the United States,—it is not a comparison but a contrast. Compare it with that of Spanish women, and we shall be less severe upon their fainiente descendants. In the first place the climate inclines every one to indolence, both physically and morally. One cannot pore over a book when the blue sky is constantly smiling in at the open window; then out of doors, after ten o'clock, the sun gives us due warning of our tropical latitude, and even though the breeze is so fresh and pleasant, one has no inclination to ride or walk far. Whatever be the cause, I am convinced it is impossible to take the same exercise with the mind or with the body in this country, as in Europe or in the Northern States.—Then as to schools, there are none that can deserve the name, and no governesses. Young girls can have no emulation, for they never meet. They have no public diversion and no private amusement. There are a few good foreign masters, most of whom have come to Mexico for the purpose of making their fortune by teaching or marriage, or both, and whose object naturally, is to make the most money in the shortest possible time, that they may return home and enjoy it.—The children generally appear to have an extraordinary disposition for music and dancing, yet there are few girls who are proficient in either.

When very young they occasionally attend the schools, where boys and girls learn to read in common; or any other accomplishments that the old women can teach them; but at twelve they are already considered too old to attend to these promiscuous assemblages, and masters are got in for drawing and music, to finish their education. I asked a lady the other day, if her daughter went to school. "Good heavens!" said she, quite shocked, "she is past eleven years old!" It frequently happens that the least well-informed girls are the children of the cleverest men, who, keeping to the customs of their forefathers, are content if they confess regularly, attend church constantly, and can embroider and sing a little. Where there are more extended ideas, it is chiefly amongst families who have travelled in Europe, and have seen the different education of women in foreign countries. Of these the fathers occasionally devote a short portion of their time to the instruction of their daughters, perhaps during their leisure evening moments; but it may easily be supposed that this desultory system has little real influence on the minds of the children. I do not think there are above a half a dozen married women, or as many girls above fourteen, who, with the exception of the mass-book, read any one book through in the whole course of the year. They thus greatly simplify the system of education in the United States, where parties are frequently divided between the advocates for solid learning, and those for superficial accomplishments; and according to whom it is difficult to amalgamate the solid beef of education with the smart sauce of les beaux arts.

But if a Mexican girl be ignorant, she rarely shows it. They have generally the greatest possible tact; never by any chance wandering out of their depth, or betraying by a word or sign that they are not well informed on the subject under discussion. Though seldom graceful, they are never awkward, and always self-possessed. They have plenty of natural talent, and where it has been thoroughly cultivated, no women can surpass them. But they love indolence: said a beggar-woman to my English maid—"Ah, if you only knew the pleasure of doing nothing!"

COPLEY, MRS.,

RANKS among the best living writers of juvenile books. Her "Early Friendships" is a very pleasing story, conveying a useful moral and told in a well-turned style. Another interesting book of hers is "Little Harry and Uncle Benjamin," which teaches useful lessons for boys.

COSTELLO, LOUISA STUART,

Is an industrious and agreeable writer. Her first work, "Specimens of the Early Poetry of France," showed research and taste bestowed on a subject which rarely interests any one save a native of Paris. Her next book was a pleasant one—"Summer among the Bocages and the Vines." She also wrote "A Pilgrimage to Auvergne," "The Queen Mother," and some others. But her most important work is "Memoirs of Eminent Englishwomen;" published in 1844, in four volumes, with a number of well-executed portraits. There are, in all, thirty-seven biographies given, including England's proudest names, and she has had many daughters of whom she may justly boast. Mrs. Costello evidently put her heart in this work; it is, however, purely English in its sentiments and turns of thought—that rank is greatness, and that high birth gives the high soul.

DARUSMONT, FRANCES,

BETTER known as Miss Fanny Wright, was left an orphan at the age of nine years, with a younger sister, the two being heirs to a considerable property. They were placed under the guardianship of a man who was an accomplished adept in the philosophy of the French Encyclopædists. Her parents had been strict Presbyterians, and, apparently, she was brought up in that faith; yet the poison of the French philosophical ideas was instilled with zeal into her young and eager soul, that should have been moulded by a pious mother's wise care; for, with warm feelings and a mind of strong powers, Fanny Wright had an enthusiasm of nature which would have its way. If such women are trained rightly, what noble beings they become!

When Miss Wright came of age, she found that the Old World was a hard field for her philanthropic plans. She had been taught by her infidel friend, and honestly believed, that religion, or the priest, rather, was the greatest obstacle in the way of human happiness and social improvement. She therefore came to the New World to see another phase of society. Her travels and observations at that time extended through three years, from 1818 to 1820; and her work, "Views on Society and Manners in America," evinced a hopeful mind, enlarged and liberal political views, with no expressed hostility to the Christian religion, which she found here not in state establishments, but in the hearts of the people. Her second work, "A Few Days in Athens," published in 1822, is dedicated to Jeremy Bentham. In this she endeavours to prove the truth and utility of the Epicurean doctrine—that pleasure is the highest aim of human life. It is written with vigour, and the classic beauty of its style won much praise; but its tendency is earthward.

Miss Wright returned to America about 1825, and settled at Nashoba, Tennessee, with the avowed intention of cultivating the minds of some negroes whom she emancipated, and thus proving the equality of races. Her philanthropy was doomed to disappointment. She finally abandoned her plan; came to the eastern cities and began a course of lectures, setting forth her particular views of liberty. She was followed and flattered by many men in New York, particularly; who formed "Fanny Wright Societies," with notions of "reform" similar to the present communists of France. Rarely did an American woman join her standard, and so Miss Wright could find no true friend; for between the sexes there can be no real bond of generous sympathy without Christian sentiment hallows the intercourse. Miss Wright left America for France, where she had before resided. Here she married M. Darusmont; a man who professed her own philosophy; the result has not been happy for her. They separated some years ago; she returned with their only child, a daughter, to America, where she owns landed property. Her husband is endeavouring to wrest this from her, and the matter is now undergoing examination in the law courts of the West. Meantime, Madame Darusmont has recommenced her philanthropic labours on behalf of the coloured race. In justice to her, it must be said that she is not like the fanatics who would destroy the Union to carry out an abstract principle of human rights—she seeks to prove the slave may be made worthy of freedom, and she does this at her own care and cost. There is no doubt that she has sought to do good, and it is a sorrowful thought that such a mind should have been so misdirected in its forming-time. We have been told by a lady who lately conversed with Madame Darusmont, that she ascribes her errors of opinion (there is no substantial charge against her purity of conduct) to the misfortune of her early training; that she has freed herself from many of these errors, and we hope she will yet be redeemed from the heavy servitude of infidelity, and find that true liberty and happiness which the Gospel only can give the human soul.

DUFFERIN, LADY,

Is the grand-daughter of Richard Brinsley Sheridan, and a sister of the Hon. Mrs. Norton. She was educated with much care by an accomplished mother, and, like her more celebrated sister, displayed great precocity of talent; writing in rhyme as soon as she was able to write at all. She married the Hon. Capt. Price Blackwood, who died soon after he had succeeded to the title of Dufferin and Claneboy. Lady Dufferin has not published much; she is principally known through her songs and ballads, which, both for comic humour and pathos, are among the best in our language. "The Irish Emigrant's Lament," written by her, will compare favourably with any lyric in the English tongue. Indeed, for its simple, touching pathos, it is almost unequalled. We have only to regret that she has written so little. Her poems have never been collected.

E.

EGERTON, LADY FRANCES,

ACCOMPANIED her husband on a journey, which gave occasion to his "Mediterranean Sketches," and from her pen "Journal of a Tour in the Holy Land." The Quarterly Review says of this work, "Lady F. Egerton's little volume, taken all in all, well justifies the respect with which we have always heard her name mentioned. Although she travelled with all the comfort and protection which station and wealth could secure to her, and the smooth ways of pilgrimage now permit, yet that one indispensable qualification which the Christian reader demands in all who presume to approach the altar-place of our faith, the absence of which no array of learning and no brilliancy of talent can supply—namely, the genuine pilgrim's heart—that we find in Lady F. Egerton's unpretending journal, more than in any other modern expedition to the Holy Land we know." The sweetest praise Lady Egerton could receive for her literary genius, would be poor to the compliment her husband has paid her at the close of his work; the offices he awards to her of "Guide, companion, monitress and friend," are significant of the true womanly virtues of her heart, and of the entire sympathy of their intellectual pursuits. Fortunate is the woman thus wedded.

F.

FAWCETT, HELEN,

THE most popular English tragic actress now living. Her genius for the histrionic art is said, by good judges, to be remarkable. She is married to Mr. Theodore Martin, a gentleman of high attainments and cultivated taste, author of the Bon Gaultier Ballads. They reside in London. When the wife appears on the stage, now seldom, her name is given in the bills as Miss Helen Fawcett.

FULLERTON, LADY GEORGIANA,

Is a novelist of extraordinary power; we scarcely know a fiction of the last ten years that so completely takes hold of the reader as "Ellen Middleton." The main incident is a most extraordinary one, and being introduced into the very beginning of the book, produces a situation that would have completely overthrown an ordinary writer; this author however maintains the interest without a pause. The work is made too long by the introduction of many useless characters and

Incidents—but this defect may easily be forgiven, where there is so much to engage the attention. “Grantley Manor,” the next publication of Lady Georgiana, has been much admired; we consider it very inferior to “Ellen Middleton.”

G.

GASKILL, MRS.,

By birth Miss Stevenson, is the wife of a Unitarian clergyman at Manchester, where she resides. Her two largest works are “Mary Barton, a Tale of Manchester Life,” and “Morland Cottage,”—which are written with power, and evince an earnest desire to alleviate the condition of the suffering lower classes of her own country, together with the ability to develop her thoughts in a narrative at once interesting and pathetic. Her characters are life-like and well sustained, and her language and descriptions of natural scenery are particularly fine. She promises to become a very popular authoress, judging by what she has already done. The Edinburgh Review thus compliments the author; “The literary merit of ‘Mary Barton’ is in some respects of a very high order. Its interest is intense: often painfully so; indeed, it is here, we think, that the charm of the book and the triumph of the author will chiefly be found. Its pictures and reflections are, however, also full of those touches of nature which ‘make the whole world kin:’ and its dialogues are managed with a degree of ease and naturalness rarely attained even by the most experienced writers of fiction.” Yet the reviewer objects to the tendency of Mrs. Gaskell’s work, because it exaggerates the picture of sufferings among the poor. We fancy those who endure the sad lot of factory life in England, will not think her statements are sufficiently darkened.

OUT OF EMPLOY.

“There were homes over which Carson’s fire (his mill had been burnt down) threw a deep, terrible gloom; the homes of those who would fain work, and no man gave unto them; the homes of those to whom leisure was a curse. There the family music was hungry wails, when week after week passed by, and there was no work to be had, and consequently no wages to pay for the bread the children cried aloud for in their young impatience of suffering. Many a penny that would have gone little way enough in oatmeal or potatoes, bought opium to still the hungry little ones, and make them forget their uneasiness in heavy troubled sleep. The evil and the good of our nature came out strongly then. There were desperate fathers; there were bitter-tongued mothers (O God! what wonder!); there were reckless children; the very closest bonds of nature were snapt in that time of trial and distress. There was faith such as the rich can never imagine upon earth; there was “love strong as death,” and self-denial among rude, coarse men, akin to that of Sir Philip Sydney’s most glorious deed. The VICES of the poor sometimes astound us here: but when the secrets of all hearts shall be made known, their virtues will astound us in far greater degree. Of this I am certain.

GRAHAM, MARIA,

Has been a frequent traveller, and has recorded her experience in a pleasant and useful manner. Her first work, “Journal of a Residence in India,” was published in 1819. Her next was “Voyage to Brazil, and residence there during nearly three years,” published in 1820. Then followed “Journal of a Residence in Chili during the year 1822;” and a “Voyage from Chili to Brazil;”—these are her principal works.

GRAY, JANE S.,

Is daughter of William Lewers, Esq., of Castle Clarney, in the north of Ireland. When very young she went to America, and was married to the Rev. John Gray, D. D., and since that event has resided at Easton, Pennsylvania, where her husband is pastor of one of the Presbyterian Churches. Her poems are the natural effusions of an imaginative and refined mind, inclined by a love for harmony to mould her thoughts to rhyme. They are stamped by a true womanly spirit of piety and household affection, and please both for the sentiment and the simple and graceful manner in which it is expressed.

GRIFFITH, MRS.,

In conjunction with her husband, Major George Darby Griffith, has produced a capital book of travels, called “A Journey across the desert from Ceylon to Marseilles.” This very extended field has afforded scope to many sketches of scenery and circumstances new to the Western World. The style is attractive, and we are equally pleased with the lively descriptive powers of the lady—and the graphic illustrations of the gentleman.

GROSVENOR, LADY,

Now Marchioness of Westminster, has written one very clever work, “Narrative of a Yacht Voyage;” two volumes, published in London, 1842. An English critic says of this: “It is simply, a sensible, healthy, and well-written work, utterly free from all affectations, and especially from that which apes humility, and betraying the woman of rank chiefly in the total absence of all attempt to display it. None indeed can open these volumes without feeling that they are conversing with a high-bred, independent-spirited woman—too proud to condescend to be vain—who, having read well, and thought well, and been surrounded from infancy with society of the highest intellect, and objects of the finest art, becomes instructive without any pretension to teach, and interesting, though giving only the simple narrative of her every-day life.” What enhances the interest, is that Lady Grosvenor appears to have written this work for her own daughters; the mother is often paramount to the author. Her duties are her pleasures; she makes no parade of sentiment; all is natural and therefore agreeable.

GUEST, LADY CHARLOTTE,

WAS born in Wales, and has done much to elucidate its language and literature. She has translated, from "The Mabinogion," an ancient Welsh work, four tales into English, adding many valuable notes, which show much antiquarian lore and just philosophy. She has been a contributor to the Cambrian Quarterly; and her researches and translations have been highly commended. Another lady, Anna Gurney, of Norfolk, niece, we believe, of Mrs. Fry, has also given much time to these antiquarian pursuits. Through the unwearied efforts of these two women, much of the early history of their country has been sought out, set in order, and thus will be preserved.

H.

HODSON, MARGARET,

By birth Miss Holford, is very favourably known as a poetess. Her chief work, entitled, "Margaret of Anjou," is a poem in ten cantos, in which the story of this unfortunate Queen is eloquently and graphically told. She has also written "Wallace, or the Flight of Falkirk," and some miscellaneous verses. Her poetical writings display a strong, romantic, vigorous genius, lofty and daring in its flight, and essentially firm and healthy in its constitution. Like Miss Baillie, she finds that simplicity is the truest strength; and she never exhibits the slightest leaning towards the rhapsodical or the sentimental. Her stories are skilfully conducted, and like a thread of gold is the vivid interest which runs through them from the first to the last.

MARGARET OF ANJOU.

Now who is she, whose awful mien,
Whose dauntless step's firm dignity,
Whose high arch'd brow, sedate, serene,
Whose eye, unbending, strong and keen,
The solemn presence hint of conscious majesty?

* * * * *
But she is calm:—a peace profound
On the unruffled surface rests;
Yet is that breast in iron bound,
And fill'd with rude and sullen guests.
No female weakness harbour'd there,
Relentings soft, nor shrinking fear,
Within its centre deep abide:
The stern resolve, the purpose dire,
And grim revenge's quenchless fire,
The intrepid thought, cold, thawless pride,
And fortitude in torture tried,—
These are its gentlest inmates now,

Tho' lawless love, they say, once heard its secret vow.

MATERNAL LOVE.

In Margaret's fierce and stormy breast
A thousand warring passions strove;
Yet now, unbid, a stranger-guest
Dispersed and silenced all the rest—
Thy voice, Maternal Love!
Ambition, Hatred, Vengeance wild,
Hot Ire, and frozen Pride were frown'd,
While gazing on her lifeless child,
On Heaven she cried, in frenzied tone,
"Oh, save my gallant boy! oh, Edward! oh, my son!"

HOUSTON, MRS.

DAUGHTER of Mr. Jesse, an author of some celebrity, is a lively, fluent writer who has produced two books to enlighten the world by her travelling observations; the first is called, "Texas and the Gulf of Mexico," being an account of a yacht voyage she made to Texas with her husband in 1843; her last work, "Hesperos," describes a journey through the United States. This lady is not sufficiently particular in her sources of information; inferior authorities are always accessible to the ordinary traveller, and Mrs. Houston is as well satisfied with the lazy gossip of a low-bred rustic she meets in a steamboat, as if she had conversed with Washington Irving. This credulity has led her into the error natural to such a frame of mind, of depicting as general and national customs which prevail only partially, and in inferior society. Her works want accuracy and judgment. Such writings pass away like ephemera: even the faults are hardly worth comment; yet sometimes the statements and opinions of Mrs. Houston are so obviously incongruous that we are amazed she should have committed such a blunder as to record them.

A STEAMBOAT COMPANY.

There were some very fair faces and graceful figures in that motley crew. Some New York families had been picked up at their villas at Poughkeepsie, and other places on the river, and were returning to the city for "the season." Many of these were distinguished and unexceptionable in dress, manners, and appearance; ladies, of whose ladyhood it would be impossible to doubt. But let them do anything but speak, anything but draw forth their words, and scream out their surprise, and say, "What," "Ay," and "Ha, aw," in a lengthened tone, of which it would be impossible to convey an adequate idea. This is a great pity; for the American ladies are often agreeable, and almost always well read; indeed, I have every reason to think that they are superior to us in general knowledge and erudition, as they are in acuteness of observation. All these good gifts are, however, marred by a want of softness of manner, and by a deficiency of those "good gifts which grace a gentlewoman." The "guessing" and "expecting" are also by no means confined to the gentlemen; and the frequent use of those favourite verbs would, in my opinion, spoil the charm of any conversation.

HUGHES, MARY,

FORMERLY Robson, was born in Newcastle upon Tyne. She married Mr. Thomas Hughes, a native of Dundee in Scotland. Within the year after their marriage, 1818, they emigrated to America, and almost immediately on their arrival Mrs. Hughes with the active and efficient assistance of her husband, and under the patronage of the well-known philanthropist John Vaughan, Esq., commenced a school for young ladies in Philadelphia, and it is believed few undertakings ever rose more rapidly into popularity, as many of the mothers of the present generation, in the most distinguished families in the city, can testify. After having continued their establishment in the same house in which it was commenced, for twenty-one years, Mr. and Mrs. Hughs purchased a farm in the neighbourhood of Doylestown, Bucks County, to which they retired. Before leaving England Mrs. Hughs had written a number of juvenile books of much merit—"Aunt Mary's Tales;" "Ornaments Discovered;" "Stories for Children;" "Metamorphosis;" and "The Alchemist." On reaching the United States, Mrs. Hughs was most agreeably surprised and gratified to find that her books had been republished here, and were very popular. These works were her letters of introduction, and thus her success in her school was secured. Mrs. Hughs has contributed to several American periodicals, and written "Emma Mortimer;" "The two Schools;" "Julia Ormond," "Buds and Blossoms;" and "The Ivy Wreath;"—books which have done more good than the novels of the Bell family; and when moral goodness shall have its right estimate, such pioneers in the path of Christian education will be honoured above those, no matter how gifted, whose talents have been used to subvert truth, or to corrupt imagination.

K.

KAVANAGH, JULIA,

Is the author of a work, "Women in France," illustrative of French heroines. It has enjoyed a merited popularity, as it contains much information in little compass. It is, however, not free from inaccuracies, which could scarcely be avoided in so comprehensive and rapid a plan. We will note one, on the subject of Madame de Genlis, whom she represents to have used her musical abilities, when a girl, as a passport to great assemblies, and to have received remuneration for her efforts. This was a rumour invented when most of Madame de Genlis' contemporaries were removed from the gay world, but we have the unquestionable authority of Madame de Crequi, to refute such gossip. Madame de Genlis belonged by birth and alliance to the ancient nobility of France: her talents for music, and recitation no doubt made her more welcome in circles where her social position brought her, and the only recompense she received was the applause of gratified vanity. Miss Kavanagh has written a novel called "Natalie," which has been favourably received. In the following she gives a graphic portraiture of woman's natural piety.

THE "GODDESS OF REASON."

The French women always shrank with horror from these impious saturnalia. It was only by threats that Chaumette could induce Mademoiselle Maillard, the actress, to take the part of Goddess of Reason in the Cathedral of Notre Dame. Momoro compelled his handsome wife to receive the same degrading honours in Saint-Sulpice, where she is said to have fainted away with shame. A young girl of sixteen died with grief and horror at the impieties in which she had been compelled to participate. It is not without reason that the church has bestowed upon woman the name of "the devout sex." There is a faith in her soul over which reasoning, or the specious sophistry too often called such, has no power. She believes, because it is in her nature to look up to higher things than this world can give, and she neither asks nor needs any proof, beyond that in her own heart, to tell her that God and Providence are not idle human inventions. This moral and religious influence of woman considerably checked the progress of atheism and materialism in France. No inquisition and no laws could prevent religious mothers from rearing up their children in the faith of God, and the contempt of man's authority.

L.

LAMBERT, MISS,

"THE Handbook of Needlework" has made this lady's name familiar to the learned and the unlearned; with many it is the only book they peruse, and to it they return again and again with ever-new interest. Garriek was said by Dr. Johnson to contribute to the gayety of nations; Miss Lambert may be truly eulogised as adding to the pleasure of nations, and filling up the blanks in many a droning existence, animating the stupid to interest, and rousing the indolent to exertion. Pedantry may strive to undervalue her labours, but her readers are more numerous from the palace to the cottage than those of the most admired poetess or novelist. Her book has penetrated into regions where Mrs. Norton is unknown, and even time-honoured Miss Edgeworth ignored; not only in the drawing-rooms of London and Washington, but in the wild settlements of Oregon, (we speak it advisedly) and in the burning cities of Hindoostan, "The Handbook of Needlework" is a favourite volume.

LONDONDERRY, MARCHIONESS OF,

By birth Harriet Vane, has written an elaborate description of her travels and adventures, entitled, "Visit to the Courts of Vienna, Constantinople," &c., published in 1844. It is fortunate for literature that ladies of rank take an interest and a share in its productions.

LOUDON, MRS.,

Is the wife of the well-known agriculturist and gardener, J. C. Loudon.—She is an ingenious and industrious writer;—participating in her husband's tastes and pursuits, and improving by his counsel, she has published several useful little works for amateur florists, "The Ladies' Flower-garden;" "Practical Instruction in Gardening, for Ladies;" "The Young Naturalist's Journey;" and in another volume she has aimed at still more extensive utility. "Philanthropic Economy, or the Philosophy of Happiness."

LOWE, MISS,

Is daughter of the Dean of Essex. In 1840, she published a volume entitled "Poems, chiefly Dramatic," in which she displays unusual powers of lofty and harmonious versification; it is evident that her studies and the bent of her mind have both led her to drink deep from the rugged but ever fresh and invigorating fountain of the ancient classics. Her style somewhat resembles Milton's. Here is an extract from her "Cephalus and Procris," which sings in strophe and antistrophe like an ancient tragic chorus.

HOUR OF NIGHT DEPARTING.

Soft pacing down the western sky,
Sad-suited night in silence goes;
Her dragons slow, with sleepless eye,
She guideth to repose.
And following still the noiseless wain,
I must not loiter from her train;
Nor ever gaze on light's gay throng,
Nor join my sisters' dance and-song,
When glows the orient main.
Her cypress veil, far-floating spread,
In darkness shrouds my drooping head,
And solemn is our gliding tread
Towards Erebus' domain.

LYNN, ELIZA,

Was born in Keswick, Cumberland County, where she now resides. Miss Lynn has written several works of great merit; "Ayeth;" and "A Romance of the days of Pericles," are considered the best. "Ayeth" contains some wonderful descriptive touches, as the following will show; the scene is laid without the walls of Thebes, near the celebrated statue of Memnon.

SUNRISE NEAR THEBES.

Mute lay the world. A sleep and a quiet like that of death was spread over all, and the still shape of repose brooded over the universe. Even the very airs were asleep around the trees and dreaming with the flowers; and the grass blades did not stir, nor the buds pour out their incense.

One faint line of glory in the east, quivering along the horizon like a thread of gold; the stars clustered near, paling away, and the dark-hued mist heaping up a gorgeous throne of purple;—one faint line, widening and growing brighter—stealing over the mountain crests like a radiant messenger from the sky—touching the high branches of the trees—descending the temple's lofty pillars—glowing on the obelisks—circling the head of the statue with a crown of silver light—beaming on the eye, resting on the lip; and a voice of music, at first as soft as the whispering of young birds in the noontide, then deepening into a wild thrilling of spirit's melody poured out from the statue. And it spread round and about its living waves, full it grew, a sea, a very flood of harmony;—a hymn of praise—the articulate thanksgiving of dumb nature—the kindling into life and worship, by the light of Love, the very stones of the ground.

M.

MARKHAM, MRS.,

As her cognomen is placed on the title-page of many books, though some assert it is fictitious. This writer has, however, laboured with much success for the improvement of the young. Three generations have had the benefit of her little "Histories of France," and of "England," where the leading facts are produced divested of philosophic comments so dry and useless to children. Her other works are judiciously prepared, and all have been successful. Many editions have been published in the United States.

MEREDITH, LOUISA A.,

Whose maiden name was Twamley, is an accomplished artist with her pencil, as well as an agreeable and well informed writer. Her first publications were in the fashion of very elegant gift books;—"Our Wild Flowers;" and "The Romance of Nature," and illustrated by exquisite flowers copied from drawings after nature by the authoress. The literary matter is full of information, where science, free from pedantry, instructs in every page. After her marriage in 1844, she accompanied her husband to Australia, and the journey gave rise to "Notes and Sketches of New South Wales;" a book which cannot fail to please every intelligent reader, though its day of novelty is over—and though the country it treats of is totally without any associations of interest except to the speculator or professed philanthropist. To the genuine lover of nature "no spot is waste"—and our authoress furnishes both pleasure and improvement, by her sprightly sallies, and accurate observations of natural phenomena. Her prose has almost made her poetry forgotten; here is one flower:

THE BLUE-BELL.

Have ye ever heard, in the twilight dim,
A low, soft strain,
That ye fancied a distant vesper hymn,
Borne o'er the plain
By the zephyrs that rise on perfumed wing,
When the sun's last glances are glimmering?

Have ye heard that music with cadence sweet,
And merry peal,
Ring out, like the echoes of fairy feet,
O'er flowers that steal?
And did ye deem that each trembling tone
Was the distant vesper-chime alone?

The source of that whispering strain I'll tell,
For I've listened oft
To the music faint of the blue hare-bell,
In the gloaming soft;
'Tis the gay fairy-folk the peal who ring
At even-time for their banqueting.

And gaily the trembling bells peal out
With gentle tongue,
While elves and fairies career about
'Mid dance and song.
Oh! roses and lilies are fair to see;
But the wild blue-bell is the flower for me.

MÉTÉYARD, ELIZA,

BETTER known by her signature of "Silverpen," writes chiefly for the London periodicals. She is a favoured contributor to Eliza Cook's Journal, and has written for some of the American Magazines. Miss Méteyard is of the progressive school, but has none of the gloom or misanthropy which those whose wishes to do good outrun their power, often display. She is cheerful, and strives to improve the habits and minds of the poor, as an effective means of bettering their physical condition. This is a department of benevolence too often overlooked; and one which the tender and refined soul of woman is best qualified to advance. Miss Méteyard has the true sense of the beautiful in nature and art, and feels it may bless the poor as well as the rich. She deserves much praise for her efforts in the cause of reform.

MORLEY, COUNTESS OF,

Is author of several novels, which have attained considerable popularity both in England and America. Among these, the best, perhaps are "Dacre;" "The Divorced;" and "Family Records;" the first is considered very good.

P.

PLANCHÈ, MATILDA,

Is the youngest daughter of J. R. Planchè, the English dramatic author. She resides at present near London. Five of her little works have been republished in America, entitled "A trap to catch a Sunbeam;" "Old Joliffe;" "The Sequel to Old Joliffe;" "A Merry Christmas;" and "Lucy's Half Crown." That these simple little tales have been popular, is fully shown by the fact that more than twelve thousand of them have been circulated in this country alone. The aim of the author is evidently an exalted one; to show the beautiful light which goodness sheds on the soul, to exhibit the power of a cheerful spirit to sustain and invigorate the mind, and to prove how much good may be done by a loving and earnest heart, amid the common ways, and with the limited means of the poorest among us; yet the moral is not obtruded, and the narrative is natural and interesting. Miss Planchè is one of the most promising among the youthful authors of England.

POOLE, MRS.,

Is a sister of the celebrated "Egyptian Lane." She has written an unaffected little book, as an humble auxiliary to the profound lucubrations of her brother. She has no learning, and affects none, but she gives an unvarnished account of the domestic life of the modern Egyptians, which is agreeable, as all true and new knowledge ever must be. Her descriptions of the climate, phenomena of the Nile, and kindred topics, are undoubtedly accurate, but comprehend nothing more than has often been given by others. We cannot take leave of the work without noticing what is to us its most serious defect—we mean the new orthography—which shocks all our early and fond associations. "A rose may smell as sweet by any other name;" but no caleefeh or darwee—she can ever work the spell that fascinates in our old Caliph Haroun or the dervish we have marvelled at in childhood. And it is insufferable to see our chivalric hero of the crusades, Cœur de Léon's Saladin, nicknamed Salah-ed-Deen.

POSSONBY, CATHARINE,

Has written chiefly for the Magazines and Annuals. Her poetry exhibits tenderness of feeling, and the religious sentiment which always elevates the fancy. She has also written several prose works—"The Countess D'Auvergne; or, Sufferings of the Protestants in the Sixteenth Century," is a work of literary merit, and interesting in its displays of Christian heroism.

POSTANS, MRS.,

Is author of "Cutch, or Random Sketches taken during a Residence in one of the Northern provinces of Western India." She resided many years in the province of Cutch, and her work is considered one of the most faithful pictures of Life in India, giving a minute account of the feudal government and customs, the religious sects and superstitions of the people. The aristocratic distinctions of caste are rigidly preserved, and the chiefs are haughty, debauched, and cruel.

SACRIFICE OF A HINDOO WIDOW.

News of the widow's intentions having spread, a great concourse of people of both sexes, the women clad in their gala costumes, assembled round the pyre. In a short time after their arrival the fated victim appeared, accompanied by the Brahmins, her relatives, and the body of the deceased. The spectators showered chaplets of mogree on her head, and greeted her appearance with laudatory exclamations at her constancy and virtue. The women especially pressed forward to touch her garments—an act which is considered meritorious, and highly desirable for absolution and protection from the 'evil eye.'

The widow was a remarkably handsome woman, apparently about thirty, and most superbly attired. Her manner was marked by great apathy to all around her, and by a complete indifference to the preparations which for the first time met her eye. From this circumstance an impression was given that she might be under the influence of opium; and in conformity with the declared intention of the European officers present to interfere should any coercive measures be adopted by the Brahmins or relatives, two medical officers were requested to give their opinion on the subject. They both agreed that she was quite free from any influence calculated to induce torpor or intoxication.

Captain Burnes then addressed the woman, desiring to know whether the act she was about to perform were voluntary or enforced, and assuring her that, should she entertain the slightest reluctance to the fulfilment of her vow, he, on the part of the British government, would guarantee the protection of her life and property. Her answer was calm, heroic, and constant to her purpose: 'I die of my own free will; give me back my husband, and I will consent to live; if I die not with him, the souls of seven husbands will condemn me!' * *

Ere the renewal of the horrid ceremonies of death were permitted, again the voice of mercy, of expostulation, and even of entreaty, was heard; but the trial was vain, and the cool and collected manner with which the woman still declared her determination unalterable, chilled and startled the most courageous. Physical pangs evidently excited no fears in her; her singular creed, the customs of her country, and her sense of conjugal duty, excluded from her mind the natural emotions of personal dread; and never did martyr to a true cause go to the stake with more constancy and firmness, than did this delicate and gentle woman prepare to become the victim of a deliberate sacrifice to the demoniacal tenets of her heathen creed.

R.

RIGBY, MISS,

HAS not contributed as much to our current literature as many other English authoresses — but the few volumes for which the world is indebted to her, place her in the very first class among writers of tales and travels. It chanced that the elder sister of this lady married an Esthonian baron, who has established his residence on his family estates; — she was induced to visit this expatriated relative, and hence we obtained "Letters from the Baltic," published in 1841. This work at once made its way with the public and the reviewers. Solid information and novelty of description conveyed in the most graceful style, brightened by wit, animated by the enthusiasm of an artistic taste, such are the attractive qualities of "Letters from the Baltic." We know of no other book that gives so clear, so true, and so detailed an account of life in the Russian Empire. In 1846 she published "Livonian Tales," a well written and interesting work. Since then Miss Rigby has changed her name, — she is now Lady Eastlake: her husband, a gentleman of great acquirements and cultivated taste, is now, or has been, President of the Royal Academy.

S.

SALE, LADY,

WIFE of Sir Robert Sale, has distinguished herself greatly for the noble courage with which she bore the dangers and sufferings incident to the terrible war in Afghanistan, the generous assistance she rendered others, and the calm good sense and unshaken faithfulness which characterize her record of the siege of Cabul and the retreat and destruction of the British army. Her work was published in 1843 — "A Journal of the Disasters in Afghanistan." The book must be read to form a correct idea of Lady Sale's character, and of the heroic fidelity to duty which lives in the soul of a woman. Sir Robert Peel said, when addressing Parliament on the subject of that war, "We are now acknowledging military services; but I never should excuse myself, if, in mentioning the name of Sir Robert Sale, I did not record my admiration of the character of a woman who has shed lustre on her sex — Lady Sale, his wife."

SANDFORD, MRS.,

WIFE of the Rev. John Sandford, wrote a little work much commended on its appearance — "Woman in her Social and Domestic Character." This was reprinted in Boston in 1832. At that time few works on the subject of woman's duties and influence had appeared since Mrs. More and the Rev. Mr. Bennet wrote their stiff treatises. Mrs. Sandford keeps religion constantly in view, and thus inculcates moral goodness as the cardinal quality of worth for the sex. So far, her work is excellent; but she falls into the grave error which every English writer has done in making reason and physical power superior to moral goodness. She constantly describes woman as inferior to man. While such is the tone of British writers their works will do little for the cause of Christianity. That the Saviour's precepts are more generally and perfectly obeyed by women than by men, no person will question; if to be a Christian and do good is the highest glory of humanity, above physical strength, which is held in common with animals, above mental power, which, without this moral goodness, is used in the service of devils, then woman's nature is the superior; and those who teach otherwise are really promoting the kingdom of darkness — the reign of licentiousness and infidelity.

SEWELL, ELIZABETH M.,

Is sister of the Rev. William Sewell, A. M., Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Oxford, and well known as the author of "Hawkstone," and as the editor of her works. Miss Sewell's first publication was anonymous — "Stories on the Lord's Prayer," about 1843. The next, "Amy Herbert," established her reputation as a graceful and useful writer, both in England and America. It was followed, at intervals, by "Gertrude," "Margaret Percival," in two volumes, "Laneton Parsonage," and "The Earl's Daughter;" besides, she united with her brother, the Professor, and the Rev. W. Adams, in bringing out a volume called "The Sketches," consisting of stories, of which she wrote "Walter Lorimer." She is also author of a little volume entitled "Is it a Dream?" All her works have been republished in the United States and widely circulated. Pious sentiment is the predominating characteristic of the writings of this amiable lady. Belonging to what is styled the High Church, she delineates with much effect the educational power of religion. Her parents, persons of great worth and respectability, are deceased, and she resides with other members of her family at Seagrove Cottage, in the Isle of Wight.

SHARPE, LOUISA.

Is an Englishwoman by birth, and celebrated for her talents as an artist. She can create as well as imitate, and in her original paintings there is a high tone of moral as well as poetical feeling. Her works are exquisitely graceful and feminine, and she evinces real genius. Her sister, Eliza Sharpe, shows an almost equal talent as an artist, and her paintings are much in the same style. There is also another sister who has given evidences of genius in the same art. One of the sisters has married a German gentleman — Mr. Seyfarth, of Dresden.

SINCLAIR, CATHARINE,

DAUGHTER of Sir John Sinclair, the celebrated agricultural writer, was born in Edinburgh. She is the author of many elegant and ingenious books, and has a great deal of vivacity, a good understanding, and a well-cultivated mind. Her observations upon character are acute, and her delineations of society happily executed. Superior to her other merits is the guiding principle of religion and high-toned morality that pervades all she has written. The following are her principal works: "Hill and Valley, or Wales and the Welch," 1839, "Shetland and the Shetlanders, or the Northern Circuit," "Scotland and the Scotch, or the Western Circuit," "Modern Society, or the March of Intellect; a Tale," "Modern Accomplishments," 1838, "Modern Flirtations, or a Month at Harrowgate," 1841, "Scotch Courtiers and the Court," dedicated to the Poet Laureate, 1842, "Holiday House; — Tales for Children," "Lord and Lady Harcourt," 1850, and "Jane Bouverie," 1851.

In one of Sir John Sinclair's works he alludes to the influence which his sister's writings had had on their father — making him a convert to the religion of the Bible; very different from nominal Christianity. No higher praise could be given to her genius and her piety.

Since 1851, Miss Sinclair has sent out a novel — "Beatrice" — which has, undoubtedly, had a wider circulation than any of her previous works. Without even hinting that one may be of the faith of Fenelon, and yet not be "all evil" — we may, viewing the book only in its literary aspect, warn its readers against taking it as a good exponent of Miss Sinclair's abilities. "Beatrice" is not, as a work of art, to be commended. The plot is both extravagant and uninteresting; the characters are a reflex of hundreds that have lived in novels — but never in real life. We make these remarks, because we think exaggeration and prejudice are of little avail in the cause of truth. We would take higher ground, persuaded that our holy Protestant faith will triumph over its enemies, though we allow them all their legitimate defences.

T.

TEMPEST, MISS,

Of the Grange, near Ackworth, sister to Sir Charles Tempest, Bart., of Broughton Hall, in the county of York, has been appointed overseer of the poor for the parish of Ackworth, together with John Hagues, cow-leech, also of the parish of Ackworth. The appointment was made at Wentbridge on the 26th ultimo, and is endorsed by "two of her majesty's justices of the peace."

Such is the announcement in the Gloucester (Eng.) Chronicle of 1849. Truly, we see no reason why ladies should not hold such appointments in every country; they have leisure to attend to the duty of visiting the poor, which is a most important part of the relief needed.

V.

VESTRIS, MADAME,

THE grand-daughter of Bartolozzi, the celebrated engraver, was born in London, January, 1797. She was carefully educated, and with no view to the stage; but her marriage with Armand Vestris, the dancer, in 1813, induced her to appear on the boards of the theatre, where she met with the greatest success. Her fine voice enabled her to undertake the most difficult operatic parts, in which she always succeeded. She excelled principally in comedy. Her character is by no means irreproachable.

W.

WALDIE, MISS,

Has written an interesting work — "Romans in the Nineteenth Century."

Y.

YOUNG, CHARLOTTE,

Has lately published a volume — "The World's Complaint, and other Poems" — which has been favourably received by the British critics. One of these remarks that "Miss Young displays poetical powers of the highest order, and seems destined to take a very distinguished place among the poetesses of the present generation."

EVENING.

How like a tender mother,
With loving thoughts beguiled,
Fond Nature seems to lull to rest
Each faint and weary child!
Drawing the curtain tenderly,
Affectionate and mild,
Hark! to the gentle lullaby
That through the trees is creeping —
Those sleepy trees, that nod their heads
Ere the moon as yet comes peeping.
Like a tender nurse, to see if all
Her little ones are sleeping.
One little fluttering bird,
Like a child in a dream of pain,
Has chirp'd and started up,
Then nestled down again.
Oh! a child and a bird, as they sink to rest,
Are as like as any twain.

FRENCH.

A.

AYCARD, MARIE,

Is distinguished as the contributor of very agreeable tales to the periodicals; she has also published one novel of considerable merit, entitled "Mademoiselle Clairval."

Modern French novels bear a reproach, which, as far as male writers are concerned, they fully deserve, of revolting coarseness and of ambiguous morality. In justice to French women, it must be observed, that from the first of these charges they are entirely free,—and from the last most generally. They never throw aside, as their brother authors do, conscience as an inconvenient weight. They cannot always be acquitted of absurdity in metaphysics, but their aims tend to what is right. These observations are not meant to be applied to those ladies who, taking upon themselves the name and garb of men, have approximated their views and delineations to the male standard of propriety.

B.

BASTIDE, JENNY,

Now Madame C. Bodin, has been a very industrious writer. We have before us a list of a dozen different works from her pen. Among these are "L'Abbé Maurice;" "Anaïs;" "Caliste;" "Jeanne;" "Reveries dans les Montagnes;" "Savinie;" "Scènes de la vie Anglaise;" "Sérénine;" and "Stenia."

BAWR, MADAME,

Is one of the progressives; a writer for the people. Her tales are not incentives to the demoralizing practice of communism; she rather teaches patience and hope, than present change and tumult. Among her works the following are considered the best—"La fille d'honneur;" "Flavy;" "Robertine;" and "Sabine."

C.

CHALLIE, MADAME DE,

Is distinguished among the living authoresses of France, not only for devoting herself to the highest regions of moral and political philosophy, but for having succeeded in producing a work which is admitted by enlightened judges to be classed among the most distinguished writings of the day. We allude to the book called "ESSAI SUR LA LIBERTÉ, L'ÉGALITÉ, ET LA FRATERNITÉ," which was published in Paris, July, 1850. The title, it must be confessed, is rather appalling; associated as it is with so much that is absurd, and so much that is horrible; but we can encourage the reader to pass over this scare-crow, and he will find the utmost interest, and the most instructive views, from the clear good sense and enlightened intellect that has dictated the essay. Madame de Challié shows these three principles originally implanted by God in the bosom of man, afterwards obscured and corrupted by the vices of Paganism, at last purified and restored in the human life of Christ, and from that time exercising an ever-increasing influence. At this moment, when every month produces a sterile revolution, when patent theories for communities to exist independent of religion, self-denial, activity, and all elevating sentiments, are every day propounded, we hail with respect a book which pleads in every page with convincing reasoning the cause of true liberty, sound morality, and individual activity, fortified and regulated by the Christian spirit. The author deserves particular commendation. Hitherto English women have claimed the dignity of ethical and scientific treatises, while the French women of the present day, however witty and intelligent, have distinguished themselves in the comparative trifling department of the novelist. Madame de Challié has opened the way to a more thoughtful and a more important field of literature, where we trust she will be followed by some of her ingenious compatriotes. We translate the following from the French reviewers of the Essay:

"When we learn that this book, consecrated to the explanation of the highest metaphysical and moral truths, is the work of a very young woman, who gives to such studies the short time that she spares from a life modestly devoted to domestic duties, we feel encouraged as to the state of society, some of whose phases appear so unsound. There are yet many strong and pure minds, who, in the obscurity of the fireside, maintain in the bosom of families the feeling and the love of rectitude; and counterbalance in this way, the disorderly passions which walk abroad. Man, with all his pretensions to moral energy, is often weak—his heart is drawn different ways by contrary impulses—and his understanding swayed by a thousand uncertainties. Woman asks strength and enlightenment from God; she finds in her faith a perspicacity and firmness that all the science in the world cannot give. In every age, in every crisis of our history, Christian women have exercised a powerful influence on French society; this influence they will still exercise—it is even by them that the materialism which threatens us will be overcome—we will see realized the words of St. Paul, "Quench not the Spirit."

CRAON, PRINCESS DE,

Is author of several novels and tales that have been popular with a certain class—the exclusives of Parisian readers. The most popular of her works are "Le Siège d'Orléans;" "Une Soirée en Famille;" and "Thomas Morus."

CUBIÈRE, MADAME DE,

Is a novelist of some talent. She has written the following; "Emerick de Mauroger;" "Léonore de Bizan;" and "Monsieur de Goldau."

F.

FOA, EUGENIA,

Is a writer of works for children, and much esteemed for her services in the cause of education. No branch of literature is more appropriate to female genius than this, apparently humble, but in effect most important art of preparing suitable reading for juvenile minds. Madame Foa's works are sound in morals and agreeable in style.

R.

ROBERT, CLEMENCE,

Is a Parisian and one of the most popular contributors to public amusement among the writers of the Roman Feuilleton. Her stories are for the most part interesting;—generally they are based upon some historical event. "Vincent de Paule" is one of the best, in which the evangelical piety of that father of the fatherless is beautifully described. It would be useless and impossible to give a catalogue of all the productions of so fertile a pen, but we will mention some of the most noted of her tales—"Louise de Lorraine;" "Anne de Mantoue;" "Le Capitaine Mandrin;" "Le Cardinal Wolsey;" "Jeanne de Castille." The style of this lady is clear and expressive; her sentiments are always delicate and refined. There is in the minds of many, a brand of impropriety upon French novels—this, with one or two notorious exceptions, is just only when applied to the writings of Frenchmen—the romances of the lady authors are almost universally free from any taint of indelicacy, and their morality is based upon the truths of religion.

S.

SOR, CHARLOTTE DE,

Is a writer of romances and tales for the annuals. Her best works are said to be "Le Berger Roi;" "Le duc di Bassano;" "Napoleon en Belgique;" "La plus heureuse femme du monde;" and "Souvenirs de duc de Vincenze."

V

VALMORE, MADAME DESBORDES,

Is a writer of good abilities. She has been particularly successful in poetry of a plaintive style. Some of these tender little effusions are true offsprings of genius. She has also written several tales which have won favourable notice.

VALDOR OR WALDOR, MELANIE,

DERIVED from her father a learned bibliopolist, an early taste for books. Breathing naturally the atmosphere of a literary society, she has grown up under intellectual influences, and has secured a very respectable place among the Parisian women of letters. Her tales have had considerable popularity; some of the best are "Alphonse and Juliette;" "Pages de la Vie Interieure;" "La Rue aux Ours;" and "Auguste."

Various names may be added to the foregoing list:—Mesdames ARAGON; D'AYZAC; DE BRADY; DUPRIN; D'HAUTPOUL; SAINT-OUEN; SEGALAS; SOUMET; SENANCOURT; ULLIAC-TREMADEURE; and VOIART: these are all named in M. de Vericour's "Modern French Literature," as living female writers of some note. None of their works have reached America, nor have we been able to learn sufficient respecting the books or their authors to warrant any particular account of either.

We might also give the names of several Socialist women distinguished for their eloquence in the clubs during the years 1848-9. Such meetings being now suppressed, these women have no way of publicly displaying their talents, as the journals are not free. So far as we have seen the speeches of these female politicians reported, they invariably appeal to religious sentiment, to the example and precepts of Jesus; yet, probably, few have ever read the Bible, or know its real requirements. In this ignorance is the source of those troubled fountains which overwhelm every system of French policy. The mothers of France do not understand the need of truth "in the inner parts"—the conscience. The Bible has been withheld from them; the dogmas of the church and the teachings of the priest are substituted instead of the idea of responsibility to the Lord of heaven and earth. His revealed Word—which Rome acknowledges to be true—has never been allowed to circulate in France; not one family in a thousand have a copy in their homes. Therefore the moral sense of woman is darkened, and she lends her aid to promote evil, believing it to be good. Men have established the law of force to regulate society, and that of wisdom is banished from the land. Nearly half a million of Frenchmen are soldiers, taken from those employments which they ought to follow and support the females of each household; instead of which the women are left to do "man's work." Is it strange then that they begin to claim also his rights?

"The great misfortune of the villages (he might have added of the whole country) is the degradation of the women through labours which belong to men," says Aimè Martin. Nothing will ever raise the moral condition of France till she restores woman to her own employments, provides for female education, and gives the Bible to her people.

GERMAN

B.

BACHERDEHT, THERESE VON,

HAS written "Letters from the South" — (Theresen's Briefe dem Süden) — and a novel entitled "Lydia;" her works are not of any particular interest except to the friends of the author.

D.

DUERINGSFELD, IDA VON,

HAS published a novel, "Antonio Foscari," said to be entertaining, and to give a good picture of Venetian life in the fifteenth century.

E.

EGLOFFSTEIN, JULIE, COUNTESS VON,

A DISTINGUISHED German artist, was for many years demoiselle d'honneur to the Grand Duchess Luise Weimar. Her vocation for painting was early displayed, but combated and discouraged as derogatory to her station. A journey to Italy undertaken on account of her health, fixed her destiny for life; yet in her peculiar circumstances it required real strength of mind to take the step she has; but a less decided course could not well have emancipated her from trammels, the force of which can hardly be estimated out of Germany. There is nothing mannered or conventional in her style, and she possesses the rare gift of original and creative genius.

"When I have looked at the Countess Julie in her painting room," says Mrs. Jameson, "surrounded by her drawings, models, and casts — all the powers of her exuberant enthusiastic mind flowing free in their natural direction, I have felt at once pleasure, and admiration, and respect. It should seem that the energy of spirit and real magnanimity of mind which could trample over social prejudices, not the less strong because manifestly absurd, united to genius and perseverance, may, if life be granted, safely draw upon futurity both for success and for fame."

F.

FRANTZ, AGNES,

HAS written many romances, poems and saga, which have given her considerable distinction among the female writers of her own country.

FREILIGRATH, IDA,

WIFE of the celebrated poet, is said to possess high literary talent. She has assisted her husband in his translations from the English poets, and has written original articles, prose and poetry, of much merit.

FROHBERG, REGINA, VON SALOMON,

Is a writer of romances and tales innumerable. Some of her juvenile stories are much esteemed.

FREYBERG, BARONESS VON,

By birth Electrina Stuntz, is one of the most celebrated female artists in Germany. She resides near Munich, but no longer paints professionally; yet though she is the careful mother of a large family, she still finds some moments to devote to her art. It is as a portrait painter that she acquired her high reputation, and in that branch of the art she is almost unequalled. She excels in children; and while she equals Angelica Kauffman in grace and delicacy, she far surpasses her in power both of drawing and colouring.

G.

GERSDORF, WILHELMINE VON,

Is a very voluminous novelist; her writings are of the spirituelle cast, and though comprising over thirty volumes, are sufficiently varied in scenes and characters to secure popularity and encourage her unflagging industry.

H.

HOHENHAUSEN, HENRIETTA VON,

DAUGHTER of Baron von Hohenhausen and his wife Philippine Amalie whose sketch is given at page 355, was carefully educated, and has displayed similar tastes with her mother. Henriette is author of several novels, and has written poems which have been commended by German critics.

HUILE, HENRIETTE, VON HOFFMEIER,

Is a writer of romances and poems. Her works are not much known.

HÜLSHOF, ANETTE VON DROSTE,

Is a poetess of much repute. She resides in Münster, where her poems have given her a warm place in the hearts of all who appreciate pure and beautiful thoughts framed for the lyre.

L.

LYSER, CAROLINE,

Is an improvisatrice and poetess of considerable celebrity.

LOQUEYSSIE, MADAME DE,

A GERMAN artist residing in Dresden, has acquired great celebrity in her profession. She is an excellent copyist. In particular she counterfeits rather than copies Correggio's Magdalene so beautifully that she is paid one hundred guineas for each copy. In this department of art, women are fitted to excel.

M.

MAREZOLL, LOUISE,

HAS written some interesting works; the best, perhaps, is a "History of the Swiss Revolution," which has been noticed with commendations by the German critics. She was also for several years editor of a periodical—"The Women's Journal," which met with much success.

N.

NEUMANN, MADAME,

Is author of a number of novels and legends. She writes under the cognomen of Sartori.

P.

PFEIFER, CHARLOTTE BIRCH-,

Is noted as an actress and play-writer. She entered upon the stage in Munich in the year 1821, and was immediately received with great enthusiasm. She afterwards abandoned the stage to devote herself to the preparing of plays. Her best efforts are "The Fair of Frankford in the year 1297;" "Hinks and the Freedman."

S.

SIDLAR, LUISE,

AN artist of Germany, is a native of Weimar. She has attained considerable celebrity in her profession.

STENGEL, FRANZISKA VON,

RESIDES at Mannheim. She has written many historical romances, and gained considerable reputation for learning, as well as talent.

T.

TWIERLEIN, ADERKEID VON,

A GERMAN poetess, (her maiden name was Stotterforth,) was born at Eisenach, September 12th, 1800. She was made a royal Bavarian Canoness in a convent on the Rhine, and became afterwards the wife of the privy councillor, Baron von Twierlein. She resides at present at Geissenheim, in the Rheingau. The characteristics of her poetic writings are tender and lowly feelings and great thoughtfulness, combined with a very elegant diction. Among the best of her productions we may count "Stolzenfels," (Castle Proudlock,) and the epic, "Alfred, King of the Anglo-Saxons."

W.

WINKEL, MADemoiselle DE,

A NATIVE of Dresden, in Prussia, has distinguished herself by her talent for painting. She particularly excels as a copyist.

Other names might be given as deserving, perhaps, as some we have recorded; but there is, as yet, little in the development of female genius in Germany that merits much attention except in a comparative view. The time of woman's best influence has not yet come for the people of that "many-sided" empire. Mrs. Jameson very truly observes that "The Germans assign to no female writer the same rank which in England we proudly give to Joanna Baillie and Mrs. Hemans. I could hear of none who had ever exercised any thing like the moral influence possessed by Maria Edgeworth and Harriet Martineau in their respective departments, nor could I learn that any German woman had yet given public proof that the most feminine qualities were reconcilable with the highest scientific attainments, like Mrs. Marcet and Mrs. Somerville."

ITALIAN

B.

BANDELLINI, TERESA CORELLA OLYMPIA,

Is remarkable as an improvisatrice. Teresa began her career as a dancer, but the superiority of her powers improving soon threw that accomplishment into the shade.

BELGIOSO, PRINCESS,

Is a very remarkable woman, celebrated for her beauty and wit, but more distinguished for the part she took in the late attempt at revolution in Italy. Raising a troop of two hundred men at her own expense, she actually led them herself, against the Austrians, and is allowed to have shown both skill and bravery which would have done honour to an experienced soldier. We have the utmost repugnance to see women, whose mission is "to serve and save," mingling personally in the horrors of war; we consider her then as entirely passing out of her proper sphere of duty; but we cannot help noting that wherever she has assumed the military function she has manifested no lack of mental ability for the direction of the undertaking. Probably this is owing to the fact that a woman never goes into the battle but from the feeling of duty—her country, or some dear one, is to be served; her intuitive moral sense gives her the power which men must gain by study and practice.

Madame Belgioso is now occupied with literature. She contributes to some of the leading journals of Paris and New York, and her articles stand comparison with those of any of her collaborateurs. She has been a judicious patron of the arts, and her conversational talents are very much admired.

The Sultan of Turkey has lately granted to this lady some tracts of land on the Gulf of Nicomedia for herself and the Italian emigrants attached to her fortunes.

BROCCHI, GABARDI MANTICA,

OF Treviso, is the only daughter of Count Gio Brocchi, formerly Judge in the Venetian Republic. Her father spared no pains in her education; he was himself her first instructor, and afterwards he obtained the assistance of some of the most eminent litterateurs of Italy to improve her in various studies. She had a natural genius for poetry which was cultivated by every mode of training and encouragement. Besides attaining various modern languages, she became a proficient in moral philosophy, logic, geometry, and the belles lettres. After her marriage with Major Gabardi di Carpi, the cares of a numerous family withdrew her from exercising her talents except for the benefit of her children. She still delights a small circle of friends with her graceful improvisations, and carefully pursues every study which she deems of utility for the instruction of her beloved offspring. She has translated into verse one canto of Chateaubriand's "Martyrs," and has written various poems.

C.

CARACCIOLO, MARIA RAFFAELLA,

RESIDES in Naples. She had the misfortune to lose her mother while she was in the age of infancy. Her father, however, laboured conscientiously to give her an excellent education. She was admitted to the "Arcadia" under the name of Leucippe Citeria. She has received honourable notice for her literary productions—and is not less worthy of praise for the admirable fulfilment of all her domestic duties. Her works are, "Translation of some of Fenelon's writings;" "Translation from the English of some classic authors," preceded by an affectionate dedication to her father.

F.

FIORINI, ELIZABETTA,

OF Terracina, has cultivated elegant literature with success—is an excellent linguist, and well versed in science. Her special tastes are for Mineralogy and Botany. In the last, she has contributed some well-written tracts, remarkable for clearness and beauty of arrangement.

I.

IVREA, MANZOLI DEL MONTE, GIOVANNA,

WAS born in Genoa. She received the rudiments of her education at the convent of Benedictine nuns in Genoa, and was afterwards placed at the monastery of St. Andrew in the same city, where her studies were pursued on a more extended base. After her marriage with count Manzoli del Monte, she resided in Modena, and indulged in the desire of improvement, for which she was furnished with opportunities. She was instructed in Natural Philosophy by Father Pompilio Pozzetti, a man of great erudition, who directed her in the study of the classics, as well as in every science. Her own inclinations led her almost exclusively to experimental science—but to gratify the earnest wish of her husband, she devoted part of her time to imaginative works, and these met with distinguished success. She was invited to be a member of "The Arcadia," at Rome, of the Academy of the Indefessi at Alexandria, and that of Arts, Letters, and Science at Modena.

She has written "La Tarquinia, a vision in verse," "A collection of Sonnets," "A collection of Epigrams, and several Odes."

M.

MILESI, BIANCA,

OF Milan, has been very carefully educated by judicious parents. Possessing a mind capable of the highest cultivation, every thing which instructors can effect has been done to render her thoroughly accomplished. Not satisfied with a proficiency in the lighter intellectual acquirements, the most profound studies have received her patient and indefatigable attention. As her abilities and her laborious course of study were well known, her first appearance in the Republic of Letters was greeted with an applause that her subsequent works have fully justified. She is a respectable artist, having studied painting at Rome, and developed a genius for that art, which would have rendered her remarkable even without her scientific honours.

MONTI, PERTICARI COSTANZA,

OF Ferrara, is daughter of the great Vincenzo Monti; she has an hereditary claim to genius. The sons of great men are proverbially deficient, whether from the impartiality of nature, who will not confine her gifts to one family, or because the great man is too much occupied with the cares of greatness to fulfil the important though minute offices of a parent. Whatever may be the case in general, Monti devoted himself to the education of this his only and beloved child, and he was fully rewarded by the result. Costanza diligently pursued the studies he directed; she became an excellent Greek and Latin scholar, as well as mistress of the modern tongues of Europe. Perfectly versed in general literature, she added skill in music and painting to her accomplishments. It was her fortune to become the wife of that illustrious man whose death Italy still deplores. Her marriage did not abate her ardour for intellectual pursuits; she persevered in her course of study, and wrote poems that met with unanimous applause. She returned in her widowhood to her father's house, where, entirely devoted to study, she lives in seclusion. So much solid information joined to the graces of a poetical imagination, render the name of Constanza Monti worthy to accompany that of her immortal father in the annals of literature.

MOSCHENI, COSTANZA,

OF Lucca. This lady is endowed with great activity of mind. She has written much, and published a translated poem, and an original one in octave rhyme, which are highly praised.

V

VERONESE, ANGELA,

OF Treviso. Under the Arcadian name of Aglaia Anassilide, she began at an early age to produce the aspirations of her muse. The Abé Bernardi, and the Abé Viviani were so struck by the talent of these little effusions, that they offered the young authoress valuable criticisms and instructions. So rapid was her improvement, that she received praise and encouragement from the celebrated Cesarotti. Her style is elegant, and beauty of thought, embellished by a fine imagination, is seen in all her poems.

VERZA, CURTONI-GUASTAVEZA SILVIA,

Is a Venetian. This erudite and excellent lady was happily formed by nature—of an amiable disposition, and wisely balanced character, adapted to fulfil every duty. Educated in a Benedictine convent, her first wish was to continue among the sisters who had guided her childhood. An acquaintance with her future husband banished these thoughts of seclusion—and a happy marriage brought a brief felicity to her life. She lost the object of her affections, and her days have since been passed in widowhood. This affliction has perhaps given the tender flow which distinguishes her "Elegys;" poems that breathe the very soul of sorrow. She has written poetic epistles to her nephew, and some agreeably sketched portraits of friends in lively prose.

Her works are comprehended in several volumes published at Verona.

Z.

ZANARDI-BOTTIONI, SPECIOSÁ,

WAS born at Fontanellato in the Parmesan territory, a place where there was nothing to awaken a thirst for knowledge, a place where emulation could not exist, and where the loudest blasts of Fame's trumpet are never heard. Genius, however, is not the slave of place or circumstance. Speciosá was accustomed from a child to aid her father, a petty apothecary, in the work of his shop; as the drugs passed through her hands, her thoughtful mind observed the chemical effects, which led to experiments, examination, reading. She chanced to become known to a lawyer of Parma, Signor Bottioni—a correspondence ensued, in which she displayed the utmost natural eloquence and grace. She afterwards became his wife, and went with him to live in Parma, where there is no want of learned men or libraries. Her first care was to select the best masters, and, after acquiring a knowledge of Italian literature, she would not be satisfied without studying the Latin and Greek authors in their original languages.

She has published several prose and poetical works, and some dramas, among which may be cited "Madame de Maintenon," which is formed on a well-managed plot—and developed by naturally sustained characters.

We might easily add to this list, as the Italians are proud of their literary women, and give celebrity on very slight grounds. We have before us sketches of over five hundred female scholars and writers, more than sixty of whom were living a few years since. But as no new ideas are allowed in a country governed by bigotry and brute force, there is little of variety or of interest in the writings of these amiable ladies. Poems borrowed in their form and spirit from the antique, trite translations upon moral subjects, and reproductions of obsolete ideas in science, make up the staple of the female literature of Italy. Still, that women do study, and are encouraged to write, are facts full of the promise of future good to the people of that lovely land.

POLISH.

POLAND only lives as a country in the hearts of its people; a separate head for its female writers may seem unnecessary; but its literature is now its life, and while that continues patriotic and pure, there is hope in the future. The most important portion of literature for the Poles is now that which appeals to moral sentiment and diffuses the love of the true and the good. The most important books are those prepared for the young. In this department women are the best writers, and it is cheering to find there are many daughters of Poland doing whatever they can in the field of letters. Among these are the PRINCESS LUCY GIOBROYE, PRINCESS ROSALIE LUBOMIRSKA, COUNTESS OSTROWSKA; Mesdames MALECKA, TYZENHAUS, and WIDULUNSKA; and Mademoiselle KORZENIOWSKA.

There is one other lady whose productions we have seen more particularly praised. Her name is TANSKA, CLEMENTINA,—born near Warsaw, in the year 1800. She has written a number of tales, founded on historical events connected with Poland, which have given her works great popularity. She has also written poetry that is commended by her countrymen. There are themes of thrilling interest for a Polish bard—but these could not be whispered loudly except by one who was weary of life. Alas, for poor Poland!

RUSSIAN

B.

BUNINA, ANNA,

KNOWN in the literary world as the translator of Blair's Sermons into Russian. This was good service to the cause of religion as well as learning. Madame Bunina is said to excel in the languages.

D.

DUROFF, MADEMOISELLE,

PUBLISHED, in 1837, her own "Memoirs," in two volumes. The work was printed at St. Petersburg, and attracted considerable attention. The authoress entered, in 1806, by the name of Alexandroff, into the Russian military service, and distinguished herself in the campaigns by her intrepidity. When her sex was discovered, the Emperor Alexander granted her an audience, and conferred on her the cross of St. George. Her memoirs are said to be interesting.

J.

JARZOFF, MADEMOISELLE,

OBTAINED in 1837, the prize offered by the Imperial Academy of Sciences at Petersburg, for "Useful Reading for Children." Her books for the young are much praised

K.

KULMAN, MADEMOISELLE,

Is a writer of popular tales, chiefly for the journals. There are now a number of public journals at St. Petersburg, devoted to literature and education which afford facilities to the exercise of female talent.

R.

ROSTOPCHIN, COUNTESS,

Is esteemed highly in her own country as a graceful poetess. A collection of her poems was published at St. Petersburg in 1843; of this work a British critic observes,—"The Countess Rostopchin has given proof of very superior talent in this volume. Though none of the pieces are of very great length, and manifest no power therefore in regard to sustained effort, they display imagination, feeling, and originality of thought. Some of the writer's earlier productions might have been omitted without any injury to the collection."

S.

SHAKOVVA, ELIZABETH,

BORN about 1785, is a poetess of note in her own language.

So little is known of Russian literature out of Russia, that we can only give the names of those women we find recorded with distinguished praise by their own countrymen. Among these are some of high rank;—Princesses GALITZIN, OUBOUSOFF, and VALKONSKY; the Countess GOLOVKIN; Mesdames BOUNIN, BRIAGA and POUTSCHOFF; and MINNA VON MAEDLAR.

SPANISH.

G.

GEORGE, ANITA,

WAS born in Cuba, where she has chiefly resided. Her parents were Spanish, but she, from her childhood, was taught to speak and write English. In 1848, she came to the United States and passed some time in Boston, where she completed a work she had previously commenced; viz.: "Annals of the Queens of Spain, from the period of the Conquest of the Goths down to the reign of her present Majesty, Isabella II., with the Remarkable Events that occurred during their reigns, and Anecdotes of their Courts." The work was published in 1850 in two volumes. As this is the only work, of which we find any account, written by a Spanish woman, since the time of St. Theresa, who died in 1582, it deserves special attention. Three hundred years have passed over the world since the holy Carmelite nun wrote the "History of her Life;" during these centuries, while so much has been done for mental improvement by the women of Protestant Anglo-Saxondom and enlightened France, not a ray of intelligence has beamed for the land crushed in its development of soul by the Inquisition. The usurped power of the Romish priesthood over the human mind operates more deleteriously on the female, than on the male intellect. Woman, having that instinctive moral sense which seeks always the true and the good, in order to teach her children rightly, must be kept in total ignorance, not only of God's holy Word, but of the history of the past, of science, and of philosophy, in order to allow the priests' dogmas to have their full influence. They take the work of education out of the hands of mothers: wherever this is done, moral darkness must prevail and intellectual power lose its influence to improve humanity. The work of Mrs. George would never have been written, had she not been taught to speak and write in the language which allows liberty of thought and expression. Her book shows historical research and a minute knowledge of the ancient régime of Spain.

SWEDISH.

B.

BERGER, MADAME,

Who was Countess of Cronhjelm by birth, has acquired some celebrity as a novelist and poetess during the present century. Her tale in verse, entitled, "Capriciosa," is considered one of her best works.

K.

KNORRING, BARONESS,

Is a novelist of some note. Mrs. Mary Howitt, who translated one of her works "The Peasant and his Landlord," says "The Baroness Knorring stands (in her own country) side by side with the author of 'Home,' and 'The Neighbours.'" These excellent ladies, Miss Bremer and the Baroness Knorring, are doing much for the improvement in morals as well as literary taste of the Swedish people. The last named writer takes an earnest part in the Temperance cause. "The Peasant and his Landlord" is a story in point, affording "one more of the many demonstrations which we every day meet with, of the highest and purest natures being driven from their proper course, and oppressed and perverted by the worst. It affords, also, a grand lesson on the subject of Temperance; and proves that though one false step often leads to ruin, which is retrievable only by death, yet that uprightness and virtue, through suffering and through death, work out their own salvation."

N.

NYBERG, MADAME,

Is a poetess, (living a few years since) who has usually written under the name of Euphrosyne. Her poems were favourably received in her own country.

HUNGARIAN.

We have left till the last, and out of its order, this country, because wishing to draw to its noble-hearted women particular attention.

Hungary with the world in general, has, during a long time, merged its identity in the great Germanic Empire; its history, its literature, its fame, have been considered as only a part of Germany's celebrity. The late patriotic struggles of this ancient kingdom have, however, restored its national claims, and we are now ready to become interested in the annals of Hungary; in its heroes and its heroines. Some of the most important of the last have found their places in parts of this "Record." Maria Theresa and Appolonia Jagiello have been duly commemorated; we now advert to a few whom, in the meagre and confused pages of Hungarian history, have given indications of force of character.

Since the year 1392, when Maria daughter of Louis the great received the crown in her own right, it has frequently encircled the brow of a woman, and, considering the rudeness of the peasantry, the intolerance of the nobles, and the low tone of political morality that prevailed in those countries, the queens appear to have worn the purple to as much advantage as the kings. In the very early story of the kingdom we must note that Christianity was introduced there by a woman.

In the tenth century, Sarolta, wife of the then sovereign, Geiza, became a convert to Christianity at Constantinople. She persuaded her husband to adopt her creed, to form churches and invite Christian priests to settle in his domain. Her good influence extended still farther: she educated her son, Stephen, afterwards canonized, who succeeded his father. St. Stephen, as he was called, was the greatest man of his era. He devoted his life to two objects—the introduction of Christianity into Hungary, and the establishing a monarchy that should protect the liberties of the people. He considered the Christian religion the promoter of civil freedom. His farther history is foreign to our design, yet we must remark that St. Stephen and St. Louis, two of the most conscientious and worthy kings that can be found, were sons of pious, able, and influential mothers.

Hungarian women seem always to have been characterized by courage and magnanimity. The action of Maria Theresa in appealing to her people, holding her son in her arms, has been very much admired. In 1132, a Queen Helena, wife of King Bela II., appealing to the Diet of Arad on behalf of her husband, overpowered and mutilated by a rival, led her two sons by the hand and pleaded for her husband, whose eyes had been put out. Her eloquence prevailed, and what, in that barbarous age was considered meritorious, her husband's wrongs were cruelly avenged.

Another Queen Maria, in the fifteenth century, finding the king sinking into subserviency to the nobles, infused into him the spirit of resistance to the demands of the Diet. On one occasion, she feared not to seize a pen, and, drawing a line through a resolution which authorized a committee to infringe the royal prerogative, wrote on the margin "Unus Rex—unus princeps," and returned the document to the Diet.

In 1683, we find Princess Helena Zringi defending a fortress for two years with all the conduct of an experienced captain. When, at length, she surrendered to the troops of Leopold and he shut her up in a nunnery, she escaped, fled in disguise and joined her husband, then a prisoner in Turkey.

The heroines of our day have shown that, with more enlightened purposes, they are not behind the old dames of Hungary in daring and courage. Many more peculiarly feminine traits—conjugal devotion, unpretending patriotism, unshaken fortitude in duty, and disinterested generosity, abound among the victims of 1849.

BENEFACTRESSES *

A.

ARGYLL, DUCHESS OF,

FORMERLY Lady Villiers, one of the noblest of Scotland's peeresses, is lending her aid to ameliorate suffering and to reform the erring. She has recently originated in Scotland a system of visitation of prisons by members of societies formed for the purpose, and the most gratifying success has attended their benevolent exertions. The first Visiting Society was established at Inverary; and, though the Duchess had at first considerable difficulties to overcome, the happy results which followed the visitations encouraged her to persevere until the efficacy of the system recommended itself to the public; and similar societies have now been set in operation in most of the towns of the North.

These efforts to lift up the fallen and succour the miserable are greatly to be commended; but there is a higher benevolence—that of assisting to instruct the ignorant and keep the innocent from temptation. The Duke of Argyll, who is head of the Campbell family, has lately been delivering lectures in Glasgow on popular reading; thus, both husband and wife are engaged in furthering the revolution of ideas which places reformation as the aim of law and knowledge, as the guarantee of order. We record the brave deed of the Duke—for brave it is to hazard the exclusiveness of rank by demonstrations favourable to popular education—because it gives pleasing evidence that he sympathizes in the earnest benevolence of his wife, the Duchess of Argyll.

One great change must come in the Old World before that manner of popular education which does good, and not evil, is accomplished. The women must be fitted for educators and placed at the head of the greater portion of schools for the young. God has given to the female sex moral sense in the superior degree; as He has given to the male sex mechanical talent. This moral sense is what is needed in the work of rightly comprehending and moulding the young soul; as mechanical talent is requisite to discover the properties and fashion the forms of matter. Scotland has led the way in freeing religion from the trammels of the state; what glory it would be if she would lead the way in the work of popular education!

* We place under this head a few names, of the living, chiefly, who are in different ways working for the cause of humanity. That such exertions of talent are of higher worth than any which mere literary genius can attain to, is unquestionable. By bringing a group of these "angels of mercy in the female form" together, we show what might be, what will be accomplished, when woman, placed in her sphere, is fully fitted for her duties and freely permitted to do what she can. Her sphere is the educational in all its forms, if not in all its branches. Every thing man learns should have a worthy motive, every thing he does a worthy aim. To inspire his soul with the love of the good and noble is woman's province in her relations of wife, mother, sister, daughter. She is the first teacher; the best exemplar of the Christian graces and virtues; the preserver of domestic purity. Ought she not to receive every advantage of learning which can improve her natural gifts as the teacher Heaven appointed for the young?

C.

CHASE, ANN,

WHOSE maiden name was M'Clarnonde, was born in the north of Ireland. Her ancestors on both sides were from Scotland, and she is only the second generation from those born there. The first of the family who emigrated to Ireland was a clergyman—the Rev. Mr. Irvine, of Glasgow. His wife was Jean Douglas, of Edinburgh, a lineal descendant from the Douglas so well known in Scotch history. Her father died in 1818, when Ann was only eleven years of age. The family were left in straitened circumstances, and, after many struggles to maintain their position at home, followed the tide which an overruling Providence has so long been directing westward, and found a home in America. They landed in New York in 1824, where Ann remained one year with her mother. Deprived of her guardianship and left an orphan indeed, she removed to Philadelphia, where her eldest brother had established himself in business. With that high independence and energy of character which has marked her whole course of life, she immediately took a share in her brother's business; attending personally to the in-door department, and keeping the books of the concern. In a letter detailing these changes she says; "I joined my brother in his mercantile pursuits, and was his book-keeper, with an interest in his business. I made myself well acquainted with the mercantile profession in its various branches, and found my mind benefited no less than my pecuniary circumstances. Industry and integrity of purpose are the chief handmaids of fortune. They fortify the mind for the vicissitudes of life." These sterling qualities, with a desire to be always useful, and a high regard for truth, both in word and action, have been the prominent characteristics of the life of this remarkable woman.

In 1832, Miss M'Clarnonde, with her brother, removed to New Orleans, and thence, in August, 1834, to Tampico, in Mexico. Here they became acquainted with Captain Franklin Chase, the worthy Consul of the United States at Tampico, to whom Miss M'Clarnonde was married in 1836.

For twelve years Mr. and Mrs. Chase pursued the even tenor of their way, undisturbed, to any great extent, by the numerous changes which took place in the government of Mexico. Under the protection of the American flag, their business was prosperous. A very considerable fortune crowned their industry and enterprise. Their house was the open asylum of all American strangers, where the kindness and hospitality of home awaited them, and where the sick were cared for by Mrs. Chase with maternal assiduity and skill.

But a change at length came over them and their fortunes — a change which was destined, on the one hand, to rob them of what they had accumulated in prosecuting quietly the arts of peace, and, on the other, to make their names conspicuous in the annals of war, and to place Mrs. Chase, especially, in an enviable and heroic position as a benefactress both of America and of Mexico; the unostentatious achiever of a bloodless and expenseless victory.

It is said in the Proverbs of Solomon, that "he who ruleth his spirit is greater than he that taketh a city." Surely, then, she who, by ruling her spirit in the exercise of a wise and prudent ingenuity accomplishes the capture of an important city without loss of blood or treasure, is entitled to a high rank among the truly great and good.

The movement of the army of observation from Corpus Christi to Point Isabel was the signal for Mexican hostilities. On the 12th of May, 1846, a decree was published by the Central Government, declaring the property of all resident Americans confiscated and devoted to the purpose of carrying on the war. This was followed immediately by another, commanding all American citizens residing near the coast to retire, within eight days, at least twenty leagues into the interior, or depart from Mexico by sea. Those who remained in Mexico would be regarded as hostages until the termination of the war.

Mr. Chase was, at this time, American Consul at Tampico. He was extensively engaged in trade on his own account, and had a large stock of goods on hand, with many debts outstanding among the Mexicans. These were all confiscated by the decree, and he compelled to abandon the place.

Mrs. Chase, availing herself of the inalienable rights of a British-born subject, determined to remain in Tampico and take care of her husband's interests. He put her in legal possession of all his property, which she was empowered to use not only for herself, but to promote the success of the Americans. Though narrowly watched, and though all communication with the enemy had been strictly forbidden as an act of treason, she contrived means to hold a correspondence with her husband, and, through him, to inform the American officers of all that was transpiring in the city. She had also a correspondent in the city of Mexico, from whom she obtained direct intelligence of the movements and plans of the government, which she also communicated.

Some weeks passed in this way. In the meantime, Mrs. Chase had drawn out a plan of the city, with the position of the troops and cannon relied on for its defence, which, with a survey of its harbour and river, she conveyed to Commodore Conner, as soon as he arrived in the vicinity, proposing that he should make an immediate assault, and assuring him that he would get easy possession of the city. Just at this moment tidings came of the capture of Monterey, increasing to the highest pitch the exasperation of the Mexicans. The spite of the mob was vented chiefly upon Mrs. Chase. Her house was attacked and robbed, and even the authorities began to consult what they should do with that "refractory woman." Her servants were taken from her, and her person surrounded with others, who would be only spies upon her conduct. This change, with a woman's sagacity, she turned to good account. Pretending to place confidence in the spies, she showed them her plans of the city, which they understood had been sent to her from the American squadron for her advisement. She told them that the city would, probably, soon be bombarded, while a force of 25,000 to 30,000 men would be landed below, to assault it in the rear, and that, when taken, it would not be strange if the whole garrison were cut to pieces. In making this communication, she enjoined the strictest secrecy, advising them only to avail themselves of the opportunity to effect their own escape.

Full of this important secret, the honest spies hastened to head-quarters, and revealed the whole matter to the captain-general. Great was the consternation of that worthy officer, to find himself in so perilous a post, and great was the consternation of the city, when the news was spread abroad. All was uproar and confusion. Despatches were immediately sent to Santa Anna, at San Luis Potosi, who gave orders that the town should be evacuated on the approach of the Americans, the artillery and munitions of war being first removed to a place of safety. The greatest activity prevailed. The country, for miles around, was scoured, to procure mules to transport the baggage. Two hundred and ninety were loaded and despatched into the interior in the course of the first night. A deputation waited upon Mrs. Chase, to learn how soon the attack might be expected. Allowing them to fear that it might be very early, they held a general council, civil and military, to decide what should be done. Many were in favour of burning the city, and leaving only a ruin for the enemy to possess. But the owners of property, seconded by the British consul, prevailed to prevent this plan from being carried into effect. Meanwhile, Mrs. Chase had sought protection from the British Consul, but it was refused, on the ground that she was the wife of the American Consul, and acting in his name, and therefore could not claim the protection of a subject of a neutral power.

Having sent a full account of all these matters to Commodore Conner, Mrs. Chase next prepared to take advantage of the general consternation in the city, and secure a bloodless victory. She caused a tall flag-staff to be erected on her house, for the purpose of hoisting upon it the stars and stripes of her adopted country. This she did, as soon as the Mexican troops had withdrawn, and the Spitfire and the Vixen, soon after coming up the river, found the American ensign already planted over the battlements of the city. The city authorities were exceedingly irritated, on seeing this premature display of victory on the part of a mere woman, and threatened instant vengeance, if the flag were not struck. They even threatened to cut it down; but Mrs. Chase went up, and clasp ing it in her arms, declared they should cut her down with it.

On learning the approach of the armed vessels below, the Mexicans left Mrs. Chase and her flag unmolested, and raising a flag of truce, proceeded down the river to make their peace with the invaders. Thus, without striking a blow, the important city of Tampico fell into our hands, subdued by the wisdom and courage of a single woman.

Tampico was important in more than one sense. It is the second seaport in the Gulf, and, next to Vera Cruz, the most important key to the metropolis. A considerable quantity of stores were found there, which, of course, fell into our hands. It was absolutely necessary that we should possess the place in order to the prosecution of the plans of the army. It was there that General Scott appointed his rendezvous, and made all his preparations for the masterly attack on Vera Cruz.

Now, all these advantages were secured to us by the energy, decision, and contrivance of Mrs. Chase, without the expenditure of a single dollar, or the loss of a single life. To gain the same by the ordinary course of war would have cost a million, or more, of dollars, and many lives of the Mexicans, at least, with, probably, some loss on the side of our brave men.

The service rendered the United States by Mrs. Chase, has been highly appreciated, and gratefully acknowledged. The officers of the Army and Navy recognised it, not only by personal testimonials and commendations, but by changing the name of the principal fort at Tampico, and calling it Fort Ann, in honour of its real conqueror. The press, throughout the land, accorded to her the praise of a proud achievement. The ladies of New Orleans, as the representatives of the ladies of the country, testified their high sense of her worth, and the benefit of her self-sacrificing benevolence, by presenting her a handsome service of plate.

She deserves all these testimonials, for she saved a city from the horrors of warfare. She continues to reside in Tampico where Mr. Chase is still United States Consul, while Mrs. Chase is considered a benefactress by the people of that city, whom she is endeavouring to aid in the improvements which their intercourse with Americans has taught them to value. Thus the adopted children of our great Republic, daughters as well as sons, are serving their chosen country, while their deeds do honour to the land of their birth.

COLQUOHN, JANET,

Was the youngest daughter of Sir John Sinclair of Ulster, eminent in Scotland for his enterprise and philanthropy. Her mother was Miss Maitland, who dying early left two little daughters, Hannah and Janet. The eldest was the Miss Sinclair of whom Legh Richmond wrote the memoir; she died in 1818, aged thirty-eight years, and after her death a little volume was published containing her beautiful "Letters on the Principles of Christian Faith."

Janet, the subject of our sketch, was born in 1781, carefully and religiously educated; and married at the age of nineteen to Sir James Colquohn, Baronet; she became the Lady of Rossshdu.

In 1805, the year of her removal to Rossshdu, Lady Colquohn began her diary, which she kept steadily for forty years; a signal proof of her self-discipline and energy in duty, as well as of her piety which thus found expression and expansion. She was mother of five children whom she watched over with great care; her three sons she assisted to instruct, and her daughters' education she entirely conducted.

In every department of female knowledge she was perfect: her own home was a model of order, industry, and judicious economy—these things are important, as showing that in her deeds of extraordinary benevolence, she was not neglecting those common duties which so often wholly engross the time of her sex.

Soon after her settlement at Rossshdu, she began to visit the cottagers on her husband's estate; then the neighbouring poor claimed her attention; thus she went on, administering alms, advice, sympathy, as each were needed. At a later period, when in Edinburgh, she adopted a similar course of visiting among the sick and miserable in that city, where so many are paupers.

In 1818, Lady Colquohn began to interest herself in that great cause, yet to be accomplished throughout the earth—Female Education. She built a school-house, and established a School of Industry for girls not far from Rossdhu, and almost daily visited it and taught one class herself. With this she associated a Sunday School. She instituted in this Sunday School a new plan of instruction, where she was the only teacher; it is thus explained in her Diary:

"I have begun a new plan at our school on Sundays—a class for grown-up girls. They commit nothing to memory. But I explain the Bible and Catechism. The class is flourishing and always increasing. Several old people attend regularly, and I hope to have more. My own maids also asked leave to go; so, with the children, I have a pretty large congregation, and it needs some nerve. But I hope to be enabled to go on, and I hear it is much liked. May God send a blessing."

Besides all these labours, Lady Colquohn found time to write; and though of a most retiring disposition, she felt that she might do good with her talents, and a sense of duty impelled her to publish. Her first book was a tract entitled "A Narrative founded on Facts," in 1822. The following year appeared "Thoughts on the Religious Profession and Defective Practice in Scotland." Both productions were sent out anonymously, but their great success encouraged her to go on. In 1825, she sent out "Impressions of the Heart," &c. This work was widely circulated, and from its good sense and high-toned spirituality, together with its refinement of taste and delicacy of feeling every where displayed, many of her personal friends suspected the authoress. Sir James Colquohn died in 1836; and, owing to the sweet example of his wife, died a Christian. Her biographer, the Rev. James Hamilton, thus alludes to her influence over her husband; "At first proud of her beauty and her elegant manners, Sir James Colquohn learned to value his wife's gentle wisdom and unworldly goodness, till at last harmony of affection merged in harmony of faith. She saw his prejudices against evangelical religion. She scarcely hoped to remove them by conversation; but she prayed for "oil in her lamp," and sought to make her own light shine. Her prayers were answered; her consistency was rewarded."

A short time previous to the death of her husband, Lady Colquohn published another book, "The Kingdom of God," to which she gave her name, her father on his death-bed having enjoined her to do this.

She continued the school for girls, and her readings and expositions at her Sunday School, and visitings among the poor and afflicted. Thus in the round of steady usefulness she filled up every day. One of her duties, distributing tracts, we have not named, nor have we space to give the details of her noble charities. She was an active member of many benevolent Societies, the projector of several, and to all she gave freely of her own wealth. She was one of the examples, we might with truth say leaders, but prefer, as she would do, a term more befitting to her sex,—of the secession, and of the establishment of the Free Church in Scotland. It is doubtful if a single individual did more to prepare the religious public for this great step in human improvement and real Christianity than Lady Colquohn. Her writings had made the subject of personal religion and accountability to God, not to a hierarchy, familiar to the people. Her last appearance as an author was in 1839, in "The World's Religion, as contrasted with genuine Christianity." She died October 21st, 1846, aged sixty-five years. We will close with Mr. Hamilton's summary of her character and personal appearance.

"Tall and dignified, with an ample and intellectual forehead, and with beautiful Grecian features, lighted up by a fine complexion, an eye mildly penetrating, there was something peculiarly prepossessing in the youthful appearance of Lady Colquohn. A total absence of all affectation superadded the perfecting charm of a sweet unconsciousness. Her elevated mind and graceful manners were instinct with feminine refinement and inherent nobility; and though in later years her complexion had faded and her figure stooped, there came the more brightly forth the reassuring gentleness, the delicate consideration, and the tact in diffusing happiness, which are among the loveliest attributes of the Christian lady.

"Thus devoted and thus endowed, it was her blessedness to accomplish much for that Redeemer whom she loved so ardently and followed so affectionately. In the nearest circle of her kindred, in her own household, amongst her younger and older neighbours, to the poor of other places, to casual visitors, she was the source of incalculable benefits. Irrespective of her munificent contributions and unwearying exertions in the cause of Christian Philanthropy, the friends of the Gospel felt a perpetual solace in her presence, and were comforted to think that in the most polished society, was exhibited such a specimen of pure and consistent piety. Her light shone to the last, and was brightest at the end, and her Father in heaven was glorified.

"On the whole I have never seen any character so blameless and harmless and without rebuke; so free from infirmities, and so adorned by virtues."

D.

DIX, DOROTHEA L.,

WAS born in Massachusetts, and passed her childhood and youth in Boston, or its vicinity. She was an apt scholar, and began early to make her talents useful. Gathering around her in the home of her grandmother, an excellent and respectable lady, a select school of young girls, to whom she was less like a teacher than a loving elder sister, gaining their confidence and leading them on with her in the way of improvement, Miss Dix became known by her virtues and won her way to public esteem. At this time she cultivated her literary taste, and prepared several books; the first, published in Boston, 1829, entitled "The Garland of Flora," is proof of that genuine love of flowers and of poetry which marks the delicately-toned mind, disciplined by reflection, as well as study. Miss Dix afterwards prepared a number of books for children, among which were "Conversations about Common Things," "Alice and Ruth," "Evening Hours," and several others. Her name was not given to any of her works, but we allude to them here to show that a refined literary taste and genius are compatible with the most active philanthropy, even when compelled to seek its objects through researches that are both painful and terrible.

The declining health of Miss Dix made a change necessary; and as, by the decease of her relative, she had been left sufficiently provided for to render her own exertions unnecessary for herself, she gave up her school in 1834 and went to Europe. In Liverpool she was confined by a long and dangerous illness, but, notwithstanding her weak condition, she gained, while abroad, much valuable information, particularly about charitable institutions. In 1837 she returned to Boston, and soon commenced visiting the Poor-House and Houses of Refuge for the unfortunate. She also became interested for the boys in the Naval Asylum. Then she went to the Prisons and Lunatic Asylums; every where seeking to ameliorate suffering and instruct the ignorant. In this course of benevolence she was encouraged by her particular friend, and, we believe, pastor, the Rev. William E. Channing, D. D., of whose two children she had at one time been the governess. For about ten years, or since 1841, Miss Dix has given her thoughts, time, and influence to ameliorate the condition of poor lunatics, and to persuade the public to furnish suitable asylums; also to improve the moral discipline of prisons and places of confinement for criminals. For this purpose she has visited every state in the Union (except, perhaps, one) this side of the Rocky Mountains; travelling, probably, a number of miles which would three times circle the globe. Every where seeking out intelligent and benevolent men, she has endeavoured to infuse into their hearts the enthusiasm that kindled her own. Visiting the poor-houses, the prisons, the places of confinement for the insane, she has learned their condition, pleaded their cause, and materially incited the exertions of individuals and legislative bodies to provide suitable asylums for this suffering class. In founding the state hospitals in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Rhode Island, Indiana, Illinois, Louisiana, and North Carolina, her exertions were of much importance by preparing the public mind to sympathise with this peculiar charity. But Miss Dix did not stop at this point. In her enthusiasm she sees only two classes of people—the insane and the sane; the one to do, the other to be done for; so she carried her cares to Congress, and, in the sessions of 1848-9, presented a memorial asking an appropriation of five millions of acres of the public domain to endow hospitals for the indigent insane. The grant was not made, and she again appeared in Washington in 1850, renewing her application, but increasing the amount of land required to ten millions of acres. A favourable report was made; a bill was framed, passed the House, but was lost in the Senate for want of time.

There are two kinds of philanthropy; one has its source in the heart, the other in the conscience; the first induces pity, the second justice, or the sense of right. The last is the most difficult, but, on a large scale, the most beneficial; it is the philanthropy which should guide rulers who make and administer the laws of a free government. The benevolence of pity is for individuals who can examine into cases of distress and interest the feelings of such as are willing to bestow charities out of their own means. Public pity, invoked contrary to the principles of justice, often induces the warm-hearted, in order to accomplish present relief, to do what is wrong in itself and fraught with great calamities in the end. The philanthropy of the good Las Casas was of this kind. Pitying the woes of the red race that he saw wasting beneath a cruel servitude, he consigned the black race to the horrors of intestine wars and expatriation in addition to servitude; at the same time, by his misdirected benevolence, inflicting on the white Christian man a stain, a sin, an evil, for which no created being can, as yet, find the remedy nor foresee the result.

Rulers wishing to gain praise for philanthropy, do, at the public cost, high-sounding deeds of charity, to be known of all men. Throughout Christian Europe, the more oppressive the government, the more magnificent the charitable establishments. Not education, but alms, is the right of the people there. Many of these charities, so called, are the worst of evils. Every Foundling Hospital and Lying-in Asylum for frail mothers is a shame and a curse to the city and the nation that established it; yet doubtless much of real benevolent feeling has been lavished on such institutions. It follows that charity, to be beneficial, must be rightly directed; that good intentions are not always to be trusted, lest lavish generosity to one object interrupt or set aside the just provision for other and more important objects. Ten millions of acres of land at the public price is worth twelve millions of dollars! Is not this an immense amount to be given for the support of twenty-three thousand insane persons? That is the largest estimate for the United States. Moreover there is already provision made by public and private institutions, for the relief of this class of unfortunates in twenty-two of the thirty-one States. Would it not be well to bestow a portion of the national domain in preventing lunacy? Nearly one-fifth of the insane reduce themselves to this deplorable condition by intemperance and other vices; the result of neglected childhood and ignorance. Two millions of children and youth in our country are now growing up without school instruction! Ignorant foreigners with their children are thronging to our land. The parents neither know the value of education, nor are able to obtain it for their children. It must be given them; instructors must be fitted and sent among them. Twenty thousand additional female teachers are required at this moment, in order that the moral instruction of the young in our country may keep pace with physical and mental development.

Is it not the duty of the American Government to provide for popular education, rather than to bestow gratuities on any class of people?

That no one is better fitted to plead the cause of the ignorant poor than Miss Dix, her success in her present benevolent mission proves. That she sees the need of institutions for this neglected class of the community, is apparent from her Memorials. In that presented at the Congressional session of 1850, she remarks justly—"The whole public good must be sought and advanced through those channels which most certainly contribute to the moral elevation and true dignity of a great people." Unless education is universal, how can this moral elevation and true dignity be attained? Again—"Primarily, then, the highest order of means for confirming the prosperity of a people, and the duration of government, must be the education of the ignorant, and restoring the health and maintaining the sick mind in its integrity." Thus she places as the first duty of legislators, the education of the people. Cannot these two objects be combined? At the next session of Congress, why not allow half of the twelve millions of property to be allotted for popular educational purposes? to found and endow Normal Schools, one in each State and Territory; and prepare Female Teachers, and send them through the length and breadth of our country? Already Oregon has required such teachers; and every where they are needed.

We make these suggestions in the hope that some one, Miss Dix we should prefer, would take up the cause of neglected childhood, as the surest way of curing the evils and sufferings that afflict humanity. Christ healed the lunatic; but He took young children in his arms and blessed them, and declared them to be of his kingdom. What an awful thought it is, that Christian legislators are not in earnest to save these little ones from falling under the power of the kingdom of darkness!

Miss Dix could worthily plead for these innocents. She has a peculiar gift of winning success. The secret of her power is her earnest zeal, and her untiring industry. She acquires a thorough knowledge of her subject. She draws up her papers with unequalled skill. We have before us two of her Memorials—one presented at Harrisburg, the other at Washington. They are models for the study of whoever would prepare petitions to a public body of men. So clearly does she set forth the object and arrange the arguments in favour of her plan, that the Committee to whom it is referred, adopt her Memorial as their own Report. The advantage this gives of success is wonderful. In framing her Memorials, she follows the manner commended by Sterne—takes single cases of suffering—paints pictures at which the heart is so moved that the understanding loses its power, and yields to the idea that no misery is so terrible as that of a raving maniac! He is a drunkard, perhaps, who has sacrificed his time, property, and health, to his sensual appetites. He has wilfully destroyed his own mind; yet he must be provided for at public expense—not merely with every necessary—but with comforts, luxuries; the means of instruction, and even amusements; while his broken-hearted wife, his beggared children are left to the hardest poverty, to struggle on as they may without sympathy or relief! Is it not a charity as necessary, as noble to provide the means of support, instruction, and improvement, for that hungry, ragged, but sane group of innocent beings, who may be preserved from temptation, and thus made useful members of society, as it is to restore consciousness to a soul so embruted in sin, that it cannot, by human agency, be recovered from its fall?

But Miss Dix only sees the insane, and those who follow her reasonings, or rather descriptions, are almost if not altogether persuaded she is right. Then she is gentle in manners and has a remarkably sweet voice; wonderful instances are told of its power, not only over the lunatic, but over the learned. She goes herself to the places where Legislators meet, and pleads with those who have the control of public matters. Thus she is engaged, in season and out of season, in one cause, to her the most important of all—and she succeeds. Her example is a remarkable proof of the power of disinterested zeal concentrated on one purpose.

FELLER, HENRIETTA,

A NATIVE of Lausanne, Switzerland. Her family was one of the most respectable in the place, and her education and accomplishments such as to entitle her to hold a prominent position in a society where literature and the refinements of social intercourse are greatly valued. She married M. Feller, one of the magistrates of that city, a man highly esteemed, whose independent circumstances surrounded her with all the elegancies of life.

Madame Feller had been educated in the Protestant faith, and thought herself a Christian, though she had never made personal piety a subject of much thought. Nevertheless, like most mothers, she was faithful to teach her only child, a lovely little girl, whatever of truth and goodness she knew herself, and it was through the death of this cherished child that Madame Feller was brought to view religion as a solemn and all-important duty. Her husband followed their child to the grave in a few years. His death was that of a Christian; and, in submission to the will of her Heavenly Father, Madame Feller now devoted her life to the good of others. Every creature of God's had claims upon her sympathy. Her strong and ardent mind would not be satisfied with that passive goodness, in which most of her sex who call themselves Christians, are content to pass their lives. She wanted to work in the cause of her Saviour. She felt that labourers were needed in His service, and she determined to devote herself as a missionary in His cause. In 1835 she joined at Montreal two of her friends, M. and Madame Oliveir, who had gone out to Canada to open a Missionary School. Here she commenced her labours among a people who are described as "a degraded race, wanting the common necessities of life, without instruction, ignorant of the Bible and of the love of God to man, living in the most stupid indifference and insensibility, and dying with scarcely a hope or thought of eternal life."

Among these people Madame Feller took up her residence, earnest in the desire to do them good, and undeterred by the doubts and dislike of those who in their blind ignorance distrusted the hand which succoured them.

Partly on account of ill health, but chiefly from the opposition he met with, M. Oliveir and his wife were compelled to leave Montreal soon after Madame Feller joined them. But she remained, strong in the hope of doing good.

On leaving Switzerland, Madame Feller provided, as she supposed, sufficient funds to support herself for life in America. She had intended all her missionary labours should be at her own expense. She brought her money with her, and placed it in the hands of a gentleman of Montreal, who was considered honest and safe. But he failed in business, and so completely was he ruined that she could not recover one dollar of her deposit. To add to her distress, she was prevented getting up a school in Montreal by the prejudices of those who had persecuted M. Oliveir; and after struggling in vain against the tide, she was compelled to take refuge at St. Johns. Here too she met with opposers, and as she had no funds, could do nothing. She had written to her friends in Switzerland of her destitute condition, but before help arrived, she was reduced to great distress. Her utterly forlorn condition at St. Johns weighed heavily upon her heart. But this cloud did not long oppress her. She remembered she was doing God's work, and that she must not faint under trials that had been foreshadowed to her. Means of support from her friends in Switzerland soon reached her, and she again began to teach all the pupils she could obtain, adults as well as children, to read the Bible. That was her mission. The necessity of her labours may be somewhat understood from the fact that there then was not more than one in twenty, of the French colonists in Canada, who could read, and scarcely a copy of the Bible to be found among the Catholic population.

Madame Feller had obtained considerable influence at St. Johns. So conciliating were her manners, so pure and peaceful her life, so devoted was her heart to the cause of doing good to the wretched, and instructing the ignorant, that many who regarded her as a heretic, could not but admire her zeal, and bless her charity. But when the first rebellion in Lower Canada broke out, the blind fury of those who felt they were oppressed, but were not qualified to discriminate between their friends and foes, was, at St. Johns, turned against Madame Feller and her adherents. She was driven by violent outrages from the country, and with about sixty of her pupils and supporters, took shelter in our republic. She was received at Champlain, whither she fled, with the greatest kindness; though her sufferings during her flight had been severe, and during the winter she passed in the United States, she and her poor followers had to endure many privations. But as soon as order was in some measure restored in the Provinces, the British authorities invited Madame Feller to return, promising her protection for the future, and urging her to appear against those who had injured her, and they should be punished. She accepted with gratitude the offer of returning to her mission labours, but she steadfastly refused to witness against those who had injured her.

"I came to Canada," said she, "to do good to all, so far as I have the ability—to those who injure and persecute, as well as to those who love and aid me. What these poor people did, they did in ignorance. I pity and forgive them, and only desire the opportunity of doing them favours."

Her resolution soon became known, and the true Christian spirit of her conduct subdued her enemies. From that time she was comparatively unmolested. Her school increased, her influence augmented, and her character was respected even by those who still opposed her mission. In the autumn of 1836 she removed to Grand Ligne, a settlement about twenty miles from Montreal, where she opened her school. In July, 1837, Madame Feller was visited by the Rev. Mr. Gilman, pastor of a Baptist Church in Montreal. He found her with her school in a barn, open to the wind and rain. She herself was living in a small garret. Impressed with her devotion, he determined to use every exertion to obtain a house for the Mission. In Montreal and in the various towns in the United States, he met with a warm and cheering response to his call for aid; sufficient funds were soon obtained to warrant the commencement of the building, and the Mission house was subsequently finished on a much larger scale than was at first projected;—the visits of Madame Feller to the Atlantic cities for several successive years, having signally prospered. This institution and its branches now have over three hundred pupils.

There is a Normal department, where about thirty young men, French Canadians, are preparing themselves to become teachers, colporteurs or missionaries; and there is also a female department of the same kind lately established. The great aim of those engaged in this benevolent enterprise, is to teach all the children in the Canadas to read, and then place a Bible in the possession of every family.

Madame Feller's character has been purified in the fiery baptism of adversity. She lives for others, and in the devotion of heart and soul to the cause of benevolence, her powers of mind have acquired such strength, comprehensiveness, and discernment, as few of either sex can ever attain. By her wisdom and perseverance, she has overcome what seemed before impossibilities, and has planted the most extensive and important educational and missionary establishment that the Protestants have ever had in British America: and she is now the beloved mother, the revered Directress of the whole. Her fifteen years of labour have only served to add new energies to her nature, new graces to her soul. Nothing discourages, nothing disturbs her. To her God she commits herself and her cares, with the same trust and love a favourite child feels in the arms of its father.

F.

FISKE, CATHARINE,

A TRUE Benefactrice, because she earned what she gave, and, while doing deeds of mercy, never forgot the claims of justice. Catharine Fiske was born in Worcester, Massachusetts, on the 30th of July, 1784. Her father died when she was a few months old, committing his only precious child to her heavenly Father. Her mother married a second husband, who was not a provident man; he removed with his family to different places, residing for a time in Vermont, in one of its most remote and wild settlements. Still, the self-education of Catharine Fiske went on wherever she was, for she had a mind that would improve. One who knew her well gives this account of her early years:

"She ever appeared different from most other children, in that she was remarkably uniform in her feelings and perfectly mild as to temper. When ever so much crossed or tried she had good command over her passions. She was never gay and flighty, like others of her age; never in the least uneasy at her situation, let it be ever so unpleasant. She could always find some one that had many more unpleasant tasks to perform than herself, and patiently endured all her disappointments, which were many, in early life. She was very fond of her little companions, endeavouring as much as possible to make them cheerful and happy. And they were not all that she endeavoured to make happy, for the aged she always felt interested in, and endeavoured to do all for them that came within her sphere. She was uncommonly attached to books, and read a great many hours and days when other children were at play. And when she did not understand the author, some one must explain it to her satisfaction, or she could not very willingly lay her book aside; and, when once made to understand, it was never forgotten. She was exceedingly kind in her feelings toward the poor and distressed, administering to their wants all that was in her power. Her opportunities for school were rather limited, even for those days, excepting that her friends at Worcester gave her some advantages in schooling."

She commenced her life-profession of teacher when only fifteen, continuing it till her death, May 20, 1837, aged fifty-three years. She was a faithful and efficient labourer in the service of humanity; preparing the young, especially of her own sex, for their important stations and responsible duties. For a number of years she was instructor in the public or district schools, but in 1814 she opened her Female Seminary at Keene, New Hampshire, where she presided during the remainder of her life. Thus for twenty-three years was she steadily engaged; having under her care, in all, more than two thousand five hundred pupils, young ladies from every state in the Union; and her success in moulding this variety of characters to an uniform model of high moral excellence was astonishing. In no single instance did her influence fail to effect a salutary impression; nor ever did a pupil leave her school but with respect for its principal.

The following summary of her merits as an instructor is from the pen of a learned clergyman,* who had known her long and intimately:

"Miss Fiske's tact in eliciting the dormant energies of some minds, and the stimulus afforded to those that were apt to learn, rendered her interesting to all who came under her immediate supervision. There was nothing that they would not try to do; they attempted nothing but what they successfully accomplished; being led on at every step by a kindness and plainness that gave novelty and interest to each subject. She seemed to act under the impression that 'whatever was worth doing at all, was worth doing well.'

"How it was that she made provision for such a numerous household, and superintended all its culinary and economical concerns while she was giving directions how to manage her farm, at the same time teaching the chemistry of making bread, demonstrating the astronomical and mathematical calculations of Newton and La Place, pointing out from the wild flower of the valley of the Ashuelot the great principles to which Linnæus devoted himself, enforcing with appropriate remarks the syllogisms of Hedge and the mental and moral sentiments of Watts on the Mind, together with remarks appropriate to the smallest girl to initiate her into the mysteries of her mother tongue, I need not stop to tell nor attempt to describe! All do know that it was accomplished

* Rev. Z. S. Barstow, pastor of the Congregational Church in Keene. Of the wonderful abilities as a teacher possessed by Miss Fiske the author of this work can testify; having been for a time under her instruction, and also entrusting her daughters in their childhood to her ~~forming~~ ^{forming} care.

with a simplicity and want of display, as though it required no effort, and as if there were nothing to exhaust the mind or to disturb its equilibrium; thus showing the 'perfection of art by concealing' its machinery and exhibiting only its happy results!"

She performed all these things while, often, a sufferer from pain, her health being delicate always, and often so feeble that a person of less fortitude in duty would have become a confirmed invalid. Her strength was not physical, but moral; this was the compelling power of her mind. Among her papers was found a document without date, but apparently written in early life, in which she specifies the course that, by the help of God, she was resolved to pursue; in it are these resolutions:

"The Sabbath I will keep with due and sincere attention. I will speak with truth and candour, which is to speak as I think, if I speak at all. I will do as I pretend and profess, perform and make good my promise, and really be what I pretend to be. Likewise, I will abstain from all excessive recreation, all idle and vain thoughts, and all kinds of procrastination. I will not precipitately nor unjustly, nor maliciously censure any fellow-being; but pity, admonish, and relieve, when possible. In a word, I will do as I would that they should do unto myself.

"I will believe the Gospel promises, obey its commands, and read them with all possible attention. I will read such other books as are clothed with unaffected piety and real morality. I will avoid irreligious companions, and associate with the virtuous, with sincere attention to their conversation. I will earnestly strive not to swerve from the strictest rules of virtue and piety."

Her piety was not only without ostentation, but almost without expression in words—it was through her daily deeds that the beauty of her Christian character was manifested. The field of her usefulness was, by no means, limited to public instruction. In her household, at the fireside, her life was one sweet strain of moral humanity; the inspiring breath of every virtue; a benign gospel, preached to every listening and attentive ear in tones and acts of kindness and love, in a spirit of overflowing benevolence, and in the silent teachings of patience under sufferings. In one of her morning prayers, written for her family and school, which, in a soft, but clear and impressive voice, she daily read, this passage occurs:

"Oh, our God, we can form most serious resolutions of amendment in our temper and conduct, but these resolutions we shall be unable to perform without the aid of thy spirit. Give us grace, O God, that we may be guarded against pride, covetousness, malice, and every vicious feeling; that we may observe the laws of equity and truth in all our dealings; that we possess the religion of Jesus Christ in all its purity, visiting the widow and fatherless, and keeping ourselves unspotted from the world."

Such principles were her guide in the daily business of life; and her management of all the means of doing good, pecuniary as well as moral, was, even in her worldly affairs, a pattern of foresight and wise economy which few men have equalled. By her steady perseverance and upright course she accumulated, for a country village, an "elegant sufficiency;" her property being, on her decease, appraised at over ten thousand dollars. This she had earned and saved unaided and alone; supporting, meanwhile, her mother, widowed a second time, and always giving liberally to such charities and plans for improvement as the community around her required. Miss Catharine Fiske may truly be styled the Benefactress of Keene. No individual did so much as she during the twenty-six years of her sojourn there for the material prosperity of that pleasant town, combined with the intellectual and moral improvement of the people; and the elevated and refined tone of social life which now distinguishes it, inducing many intellectual and rich denizens of Boston and other cities to make it their chosen place of retreat, is, in a great measure, traceable to the influence of her school and her beautiful exhibition of the character of an educated Christian lady. And who shall estimate the amount of good to families, society, the whole land, which her influence had in moulding the characters of her pupils, the twenty-five hundred young girls committed to her care? Most of these are now mothers, stamping on thousands and thousands of young, unformed minds, the seal of those eminent virtues they honoured in her. Many an impression may be faint, but if it be true, it will come out brighter and clearer as the fires of passion and temptation burn around it. Was she not a public Benefactress? Her visible influence for good did not cease with her life. She had no relation but her aged mother. The disposition made of her property showed, to quote again from the excellent sketch of Mr. Barstow, "the desire of Miss Fiske that it might do good from generation to generation." Her first expressed wish was that her beloved mother should have every possible comfort during her life; then she directed a certain and liberal annuity to one faithful assistant teacher, who had been a long time in the school; then provision was made for the relief of domestics and any of her pupils reduced to distress; after a term of years, when all these private benefactions had been accomplished, the residue of the property and its accumulations were to go in aid of the first Charitable Asylum for the Insane established in New Hampshire.

In the wise allotment of Providence, men are the providers, women the dispensers; the earnings of the one sex, to become most beneficial, should be submitted to the economy of the other. Few are the instances recorded where a female has accumulated property; what she earns is for immediate and pressing exigencies, to supply which is really the province of the stronger sex. Miss Fiske is a remarkable exception; she united in her character the best qualities of both the sexes. Well might Mr. Barstow close his notice of her by asserting that "she was a woman of great originality, of uncommon powers, of great influence, of true humility, of comprehensive plans, and of real philosophical greatness." Her history belongs to her country. And may it show all that the circumstances of birth, orphanage, or physical weakness, and, in our country, we may add, of sex, militate nothing against the usefulness and respect which talents and virtue will secure. May it show the trifling, the giddy, and the thoughtless, that it is no proof of greatness to despise religion, and that true piety is the only passport to heaven!

H.

HILL, FRANCES M.,

DESERVEDLY honoured for her long and beneficial exertions in the cause of female education in Greece, was born in the city of New York. Her father, John W. Mulligan, Esq., still living, is a lawyer of high repute, one of the oldest members of the bar in that city. Besides Mrs. Hill, two other daughters of Mr. Mulligan have been teachers in the missionary school at Athens; the father who has educated his children so wisely and encouraged them to employ their talents in the service of God and humanity must be worthy of the exceeding great reward he is enjoying in their extended usefulness and wonderful success.

The marriage of Miss Frances M. Mulligan with the Rev. John H. Hill, seems to have been one of those unions ordered in heaven for an example of the conjugal happiness Christians may enjoy if suitably mated, while by their united faith and labours every obstacle in the path of duty is removed or surmounted, and the good accomplished is almost incredible. Such has been the mission of Mr. and Mrs. Hill.

In 1831, there was an attempt made by the Protestant Episcopal Church in America to assist the most ancient Eastern Church of Christ, that of the Greek. In pursuance of this plan the Rev. John H. Hill and his wife were sent to Athens, to found and superintend such seminaries of learning and Christian morals as they might find practicable and useful. Athens, on their arrival, presented to them, when entering within its crumbling walls, a scene of desolation such as inevitably follows in the bloody train of war. The city was one mass of ruins, over and among which these missionary teachers had then to pick their almost pathless way. In the course of a few weeks they began to gather around them the destitute half-clad and ignorant daughters of Greece, although many of these were among the well-born, who had been reduced to poverty by the war, which had, for a time, levelled all classes. Upon Mr. and Mrs. Hill was devolved the momentous task of moulding the new social features of the Greek people just escaped from Turkish bondage, and soon to take their position among the civilized nations of Europe.

Mrs. Hill immediately commenced her school for girls, in which Mr. Hill has always been her coadjutor, adviser, and what God designed the husband should be to his wife, her protector and head. It is a beautiful trait in the character of Mrs. Hill, worth remark, in this age of innovation, when foolish women (meaning those who do not place duties paramount to rights) are clamouring for independence in the married as well as single state, to note the sweet modesty which characterizes her sentiments on the subject. In a letter to a friend, she thus alludes to her position:—

"I think you will agree with me that if it had not been for the establishment of the mission to Greece, I might have passed the even tenor of my life like thousands of others, unnoticed and unknown, save in the family circle; or, at the most, not beyond my intimate friends. If my name has become more known to the public than that of other female members of the mission, it has been simply on account of my connexion with him, who is at its head." She goes on to give a due share of praise to the assistants, and says that what has been accomplished "is owing to the combined efforts of all who have been engaged in the work."

Mr. Hill opened a school for Greek boys at the same time; it has succeeded and done much good, but the greatest blessing to Greece has been the school for girls. Divine Providence is thus surely working out through the special influence of the female sex, a wonderful system for regenerating the Eastern World. That such a change of sentiment should occur respecting the capacity of women to acquire knowledge and become the teachers of national schools in the country where, until twenty years ago, all learning was confined to the other sex, seems little short of a miracle. Mrs. Hill has so graphically described the process that we will quote from her admirable letter, premising that the school was opened in the magazine or cellar of the house in which they resided—that the first day she had twenty pupils and in two months one hundred and sixty. That not more than six could read, and only ten or twelve knew a letter.

"We began with the alphabet! but even before the point had been reached where elementary education advances to that of a higher order, circumstances already pointed out the necessity of providing for it. Our views were transmitted to some of our friends in the United States—they met with a gratifying response from many ladies of very high character in our own communion; and some ladies of different denominations united in a society, under the direction of Mrs. Emma Willard of Troy, New York, for the avowed purpose of educating female teachers in Greece under our immediate care and superintendence. This department continued in very successful operation from 1834 to 1842. In the meanwhile, and during this period, another progressive change took place. Athens, which had been under the Turkish rule until 1833, became in 1834 the capital of the new kingdom of Greece, and the families of those who were connected with government, came to reside in Athens. No provision having been made in any quarter for the education of the daughters of these families, an appeal to us on the part of the parents of such to permit their daughters to enjoy those privileges of education which we were affording to the native females of Athens exclusively, could not be put aside—and in this manner, the daughters of the most influential and best educated families in Greece, were added to those who were already with us and who were destined to be employed in extending the same benefits to their fellow countrywomen. About the same time, in consequence of the destitution of means which existed nearly throughout the Levant, applications were made to us from the more wealthy families in Smyrna and Constantinople, and Jassy and Bucharest, in the North and East, as well as from the Ionian Islands in the West. And at one period we actually had pupils from all those places congregated under our roof. The domestic establishment of our Mission from 1837 to 1842, embraced 60 pupils, while at the same time there were no less than from 500 to 600 in daily attendance upon the schools, as externes. The Greeks, however, with a laudable pride, were not willing to allow strangers to do everything for them. They were not long in setting on foot measures for bearing a part themselves, in the great work of female education. A society was formed (in Greek, ἡ φιλεκπαίδευτική Ἑταιρία) which had for one of its objects the preparation of female teachers. To this Society, in 1842, we made over the whole of our domestic establishment. The necessity which had imposed upon us this duty, had ceased, and the impulse had been given: the work, moreover, had become much too laborious for those who were engaged in it. The funds of that Society are continually increasing by liberal donations from wealthy Greeks residing in Germany, in the Danube provinces, and elsewhere.

With regard to the number of pupils who have been educated in our schools, it would be difficult to make an exact estimate. If we assume 250 for the annual average of such as had completed their education, and gone out into the world; and if we commence our reckoning from 1836, i. e. five years after we commenced our labours here, we may fairly, I think, put down the number at 3500. I have no wish to exaggerate numbers, and I hope I am within the limit of facts.

Although there are no female schools which can, strictly speaking, be called branches of the Mission School at Athens, there is scarcely one throughout the Kingdom, of which either the Directresses or some of the Teachers, have not been educated, wholly or in part, by us. For years we had a Normal School for the education of female teachers, sent to us by the Government from different provinces of the Kingdom. Several of these, by the terms of the agreement we made with the Government, after being examined and receiving their Diplomas, were sent into the Morea and other parts to open schools in their respective districts as Government Teachers. One of these laboured most effectually in the island of Hydra for seven years, where no school for females had ever existed. The school she established is still continued there, and is very flourishing—but she, after seven years' labour there, returned, and is now one of the most efficient of our teachers in the Mission Schools.

The effects of female education here has been most gratifying. We have had the pleasure of observing many of our early pupils in domestic life, as wives and mothers at the head of their families, discharging the high trust reposed in them, with a care and assiduity most exemplary and praiseworthy. We know of many instances where the Mother who had been educated under our eye, has waited with anxiety for the period when she could place her children under the salutary influence of our system of instruction. We have seen the powerful effect of a good and virtuous education overcoming the custom of ages, and the power of Mammon. Many parents who have had no other dowry to bestow upon their daughters but this—"that they had been educated in our schools,"—have married their daughters to men of education and good sense, able to support them well—and we have seen their mothers coming to us with tears of gratitude, acknowledging the lasting benefits conferred by education, when they found that an instructed mind was prized by men of sense, more than money or lands.

This is a concise summary of the progress of female education in Greece; and I think I may add that the female sex has made greater use of their advantages, and greater improvement in proportion to their advantages, than the male sex."

Such immense benefits to a nation are the work of one true missionary family, where the object has been to lay the foundation of Christian character in the hearts of little children, the girls receiving equal instruction with the boys. Is there a Mission School in the world that has ever accomplished so much good within the same number of years? and done the work with so little expense?

We might describe its blessings to the Greek people, and the great popularity it enjoys; tell how the rulers of that land pay homage to the moral power of the missionaries, and consider it an honour that Mrs. Hill's school for girls is in their chief city; how distinguished foreigners give praise to her noble deeds, and acknowledge this institution as the chief agent of improvement in Athens; how the whole nation looks to her and her husband as its Benefactors; but the limits of this sketch will not permit. It is enough to say that the great work of the American Mission in Greece is acknowledged to be the means of incalculable and unqualified good to the land of Pericles and Aspasia; who never, in their proudest triumphs, enjoyed that of ruling over the moral sense and enlightened conscience of their admirers.

Only one branch—an important one—of instruction needs to be added to make the system of Mrs. Hill complete—that of preserving health. Women are the natural guardians of infancy; they should be carefully instructed in Medical Science. Anatomy, Physiology, Hygiene, are studies more appropriate to their condition and duties than to those of men. That the one sex has monopolized all the knowledge on this science is no reason they should continue to hold it, any more than because the old Greek philosophers taught only by lectures, therefore books should be thrown aside. The art of printing has opened the temple of learning to woman; every year is giving new and unquestionable proofs that she is the heaven-appointed help of man in all that really improves the race. Health is one of the first earthly blessings; it is necessary to the best development of the soul, as well as body;—let the art or science which teaches how to preserve it and to restore it, be taught to those who are watchers by the cradle of infancy, and soothers by the couch of suffering. The whole East, Mahomedans as well as Christians, might be reached by the ministry of pious female physicians for their own sex. The important practice of Midwifery has never passed into the hands of men in the land where the son of a midwife was the wisest heathen philosopher who has ever appeared. The greatest benefaction the Mission at Athens could now confer on humanity, would be to educate Female Physicians, into whose hands might be given the care of women and children.

P.

PETER, SARAH,

Is the projector and real founder of the "School of Design for Women," established in Philadelphia, an institution promising much usefulness to the country as well as being particularly beneficial to a portion of her own sex. Such services deserve a record that will keep them in remembrance.

Mrs. Peter, now wife of William Peter, Esq., British Consul for the State of Pennsylvania, was born near Chillicothe, in Ohio. Her father, the Hon. Thomas Worthington, held high offices in that State, had been Governor and United States Senator, and was warmly and deservedly esteemed. Indeed he was one of those truly called "Fathers of Ohio," for he was among its first and most efficient settlers. Born in Virginia, inheritor of a large estate, he emancipated his slaves, sold his pleasant home and removed with his family to the then wild region of the West. His wife was a most excellent woman, one of the noble matronage of America, whose piety, prudence and energy have moulded the characters of men not only able to win freedom but who are worthy of its privileges and blessings. Inheriting from such parents a mind of strong and energetic powers, Miss Worthington was trained to use her talents for high and holy purposes; the false idea often promulgated that girls are to be the ornaments merely of society was not suffered to enervate her character with that sickly sentimentality which is only refined selfishness. She was taught that her genius to be really noble must be usefully employed; that wisdom consists in keeping one's lamp always trimmed and burning, an injunction binding equally on both sexes. She was carefully and liberally educated, or rather had entered on such a course, for the grave error was committed by her parents of permitting her to be taken from school and married at the age of sixteen. Her first husband was Edward King, son of Hon. Rufus King, of New York. He died in 1836, leaving her with two sons, whose training she had carefully superintended. They were then fitted for college; she took them to Massachusetts, entering them at Harvard University, and settled herself in Cambridge for the ensuing four years to watch over their education and to perfect her own. We give these particulars of her private life not only as highly honourable to her, but as an example and encouragement to all widowed mothers, and mothers however situated, who can do much, if they will earnestly endeavour, both to cultivate their own talents and develope and direct the minds of their sons. A girl of sixteen is not educated; it is wrong, it is cruel to impose on immature youth the cares and sorrows of married womanhood; few have the constitution, courage and moral energy to overcome the disadvantages of such an early marriage. The subject of our sketch did surmount them all, improving her own mind in order to instruct her sons, maintaining always her dignified position as their moral guide and intelligent friend whose wise counsel they considered it a privilege to enjoy and by following they escaped the temptations and vices which destroy so many of our young men; she has the reward of her faithfulness, in seeing her living son pursuing an honourable career, and, the one summoned away, living the life and dying the death of a Christian. In 1844, Mrs. King's second marriage took place, and she became Mrs. Peter. Her sons were settled in life. She could devote her leisure to those benevolent plans which had for a long time been near her heart.

Mr. Peter was ready to aid her; he was not jealous of female talent and influence; good men seldom are. Particular circumstances had directed her thoughts to the condition of her own sex. She saw that to improve the world it was necessary to begin with its first teachers. Women had the forming power; it was needed that they should not only be fitted for this high and responsible office, but be held in great honour because God had given them such mighty moral influence. To rescue them from the degradation of inferiority which the sensuality and infidel philosophy of man have sought to throw on the mental powers of the female sex, was and is her aim. In order to effect this she has sought to open employments more elevating as well as remunerating to those who are compelled to support themselves, not that Mrs. Peter would counsel women to compete with men for worldly distinctions, or make their claims to honour rest on contributing an equal share to the pecuniary wealth of the state. God designed woman for the higher office of all that is lovely and good. If she were to enter into the business of the world and become as eager in its pursuit as man, there would be no hope of improvement for the race. But instances occur even in our favoured land, where females are bound, in duty, to sustain themselves—perhaps others. In order to assist these, Mrs. Peter projected the opening of a School of Design for women; her motives and her efforts are so truly and touchingly set forth in her letter to the president of the Franklin Institute (for the promotion of the mechanic arts—a school for young men, &c.) that we will quote a few passages:—

“Having for a series of years observed with deep concern the deprivation and suffering to which a large and increasing number of deserving women are exposed in this city and elsewhere, for want of a wider scope in which to exercise their abilities for the maintenance of themselves and children; and, after bestowing much thought and enquiry with reference to the best means of alleviating the miseries incident to their condition, I resolved, about two years since, to attempt the instruction of a class of young girls in the practice of such of the arts of design as were within my reach. I selected this department of industry, not only because it presents a wide field, as yet unoccupied by our countrymen, but also because these arts can be practised at home, without materially interfering with the routine of domestic duty, which is the peculiar province of women.

“In the month of November, 1848, I gathered a drawing class of some twenty young women, under the instruction of an accomplished teacher.

A few months later he was assisted by the gratuitous lectures, on perspective, of a gentleman who kindly offered his services. About the same period a class was formed from among the pupils to draw and engrave maps; but after a time, in consequence of the impossibility of procuring a permanent teacher, this part of my plan was relinquished. At the expiration of a year, several of the pupils commenced the art of wood engraving, which they still practise with every prospect of success. Meantime the drawing class has steadily pursued its way, exhibiting a degree of perseverance which assures to its members, sooner or later, the remuneration which they deserve.

“It is believed that such a School of Design, wisely managed, and on a scale worthy of its locality, would be conducive of great benefit by adding to the productive industry of Philadelphia in a department where the demand greatly exceeds the supply; and that it would also prove a valuable adjunct to many arts and trades which require the invention or reproduction of forms and patterns for articles of use or ornament, as, for instance, household goods and utensils of every description, mouldings and carvings, paper hangings, carpets, calico printing, &c., &c., for which patterns must now be procured from abroad, at much expense and uncertainty.

* * * * *

“For our men, there are now, and there must long continue to exist, so many more direct and more easily to be attained avenues to fortune, that high excellence in the industrial arts of design can rarely be expected from them. Our women, on the contrary, are confined to the narrowest possible range of employment; and owing to the unceasing drain, by emigration to the West and elsewhere, of young and enterprising men, we have a constantly increasing number of young women, who are chiefly or entirely dependent upon their own resources, possessing respectable acquirements, good abilities, some times even fine talents, yet who are shut out from every means of exercising them profitably for themselves or others. To such as these the establishment of a School of Design opens at once the prospect of a comfortable livelihood, with the assurance of a useful and not ignoble career.”

This appeal had a good effect. The officers of the Franklin Institute consented to take “The School of Design for Women” under their care, provided a sum sufficient to insure the efficiency of the plan could be raised from the liberality of the community. By the earnest exertions of Mrs. Peter and other friends of the benefaction, the necessary funds were soon obtained, without any appeal to legislative aid.

On the 2d of December, 1850, all preliminaries having been settled, the “School of Design for Women” was opened. The subscribers, students and friends attended; Bishop Potter (of the diocese) presided, and, before invoking the Divine blessing, made an address full of wise suggestions and warm hopes: after the prayer, Hon. J. R. Ingersoll delivered an eloquent speech in favour of female education. The school is prospering.

W.

WHITTLESEY, ABIGAIL GOODRICH,

WIDELY known as the benefactress of mothers, was born in Ridgefield, Connecticut, where her father, the Rev. Samuel Goodrich, was then settled as pastor over the Congregational Church. He afterwards removed to Berlin, in that state, where Miss Goodrich was chiefly educated. Her family are remarkable for piety and talents; among these may be named her two brothers, the Rev. Charles A. Goodrich and the Hon. Samuel G. Goodrich, (Peter Parley,) who have long been known as able and interesting writers.

Miss Goodrich, under her wise and pious instructors, became in early youth devoted to the service of her Saviour, and, fortunately for her happiness, met with a congenial mind and heart in the Rev. Samuel Whittlesey, to whom she was married in 1808. He was then the settled clergyman in a country parish, where he continued, eminently successful, for many years, while his amiable wife became intimately acquainted with the habits, circumstances, and wants of women who live in the country. In this respect, her experience contributed to fit her for the post which she subsequently occupied; viz., that of a writer in behalf of mothers, and particularly as the editress of a magazine devoted to their interests. In this relation to the literary and religious public she has long been known and deservedly admired. The periodical referred to was for many years conducted by her under the name of the "Mother's Magazine." She is now the editress of a new one, commenced a year or two since, entitled "The Magazine for Mothers and Daughters."

But Mrs. Whittlesey had other experience than that pertaining to the country antecedently to her entrance on the profession of authorship in the line above-mentioned, and which fitted her still further for this honourable and useful calling. After Mr. Whittlesey, at his own request, received a dismission from his pastoral relation at New Preston, he took in charge the "American Asylum of the Deaf and Dumb," at Hartford, in which very responsible station Mrs. Whittlesey's efficient labours, as well as those of her husband, contributed largely to the prosperity of the institution. Subsequently, they had charge of large and flourishing female seminaries in Canandaigua and in Utica, N. Y. Coming in contact, thus, with many of her sex in the forming period of life and in the process of intellectual and moral education in which she herself had so direct an agency, her observations and experience were of the utmost consequence to her in her appreciation of the wants of the mothers and daughters of the land. She saw, also, how necessary was the development of female character and influence.

With such a stock of knowledge and experience, and with an ardent desire to serve her Divine Master in doing good to her sex and the world, she projected the "Mother's Magazine." It was in the city of Utica that this important undertaking was matured and carried into effect; the publication commencing in the year 1833. The "Mother's Magazine" was as original in its conception as it has proved to be able in its execution and useful in its influence. It was the offspring of much thought, consultation, and prayer, attended, indeed, with the usual anxiety and misgivings incident to new enterprises. The projector of the work, however, was probably less apprehensive of the result than many others, though even she could hardly have conjectured "whereunto this would grow" through the series of years it has continued. It is commonly found in experience, that they who have the talent or the grace to conceive and bring into existence important measures for human benefit are the most hopeful of success. They see beyond others in that particular in consequence of the thought and mental struggle which their project has cost them. They have considered more closely its bearings and relations, and feel more acutely the want which originated it. What other minds less gifted with foresight or more sceptical as to results rather desire than expect, is with them often reduced to a moral certainty.

Mrs. Whittlesey's feelings were deeply interested in that portion of her sex which she wished more particularly to reach. This she sometime previously evinced in procuring the tract "An Address to Mothers," to be written. She was therefore the person, in view both of her ability and her zeal, her advantages and experience, to prepare a medium of communication with her sisters, the mothers of the land. She proposed in her Magazine the twofold object of enlightening the minds of this portion of her sex on the subject of their relation to the community and to the church and the duties growing out of that relation; and at the same time of presenting the motives and encouragements to appropriate and effective labour in their own peculiar sphere. Then, she hoped to operate, through mothers, on all classes of the community; on the male part, as well as the female; on husbands, and fathers, and sons, as well as wives, and daughters, and the sex generally. But it was to do only woman's work by woman's agency. It was in no Mary Wolstonecraft spirit that the good which she wished to bring about was to be sought. It was not by trenching on the province of men, nor by usurping their place, that she would effect a reformation or improvement in the whole subject of the moral training of the young, and arm woman with her true power. Woman she would keep to her own influence, but it was an influence neither inconsiderable nor doubtful. It was not to be confined within narrow limits. It could not be easily evaded whenever or wherever it should appear. It was insinuating, permeating like the air; it was gentle as the dews, reaching and blessing alike the root and the branches of the living, intellectual, moral being. It was truly a material work that Mrs. Whittlesey through her journal sought to accomplish—the preparation and efficiency of mothers as agents in moulding the character of their offspring. It was a truly feminine, delicate, graceful, though dignified and potent work.

Having laid her own beloved ones in their infancy upon God's altar, and sought by all appropriate means to train them for the service of their Divine Master, and having joyfully seen the most of them in the morning of life dedicating themselves to his service, she has, with convincing power and energy, urged the mothers of the land to employ those means in the education of their children which in her case God had so signally blessed. She has given great prominence to the cause of missions in the pages of her journal, and entreated parents to train up their children not only for the church at home, but with special reference to extending the triumphs of the cross in heathen lands. Many children of missionaries have been committed to her maternal care, and have obtained through her the means of education and support; but, not content with this, she gladly surrendered her first-born son to become a foreign missionary. His qualifications for usefulness and his long course of training were such as to excite the fond hope that he would be long spared to labour on earth; but the Master was in these fast ripening him for some higher post of responsibility in the upper sanctuary. A long life of service to the church at home could never have made him so holy a man as did the few years he was employed in missionary labour in India.

Maternal Associations have long been subjects of her fostering care. Through her influence and correspondence these institutions were greatly multiplied in this country, in Europe, and other foreign lands, before the commencement of her Magazine, one design of which was to extend their influence and to furnish a means of communication between them.

In her personal appearance Mrs. Whittlesey is prepossessing and dignified; in her address easy and unaffected; in her conversation gentle, deliberate, and persuasive; in her natural temperament genial, warm, and sympathetic; in her judgment sound and discriminative, arriving at her conclusions less, perhaps, by a formal process of induction, than by a native aptness and a sanctified taste. She was made for influence in whatever path of life she might have chosen. In that which Providence has actually assigned to her, she has sought to wield it for the noblest ends. We rejoice in its extent, since it is apparent that she views it only as a talent to be employed in her Saviour's service. For her efforts to raise the standard of maternal hope and fidelity, to sow the seeds of domestic virtue and happiness far and near, and to improve and elevate the character of female influence in general, she is destined, we believe, to be long and affectionately remembered as a most efficient and noble Benefactress.

VARIOUS NAMES.

MANY other ladies are distinguished for beneficent acts and influences of great importance to humanity and religion; a few of these we will particularize.

THE MARCHIONESS OF HASTINGS, (by birth Flora Muir Campbell, Countess of Loudoun,) lent her efficient aid to the female missionaries in Calcutta while her husband was Governor-General of Bengal. On the arrival of Miss Cooke—better known as Mrs. Wilson—in India, the Marchioness kindly received, encouraged and assisted her to found those "Female Schools" which are doing more than any other human influence to Christianize the heathen. The noble lady often went herself to the abodes of the poor natives, visiting lanes and gulleys where Europeans are seldom seen, and by her kindly and gentle persuasions induced the miserable mothers to allow their little daughters to attend school. Thus she laboured in the true mission cause, visiting the schools, furnishing work for the pupils, and giving rewards to the deserving.

LADY AMHERST, whose husband, Lord Amherst, succeeded the Marquis of Hastings in the Governorship of India, is also distinguished for the interest she took in the success of "The Ladies' Society for Native Female Education in Calcutta," of which she was Patroness.

MRS. PRISCILLA CHAPMAN is another benefactress of the poor heathen. She has been an earnest helper in obtaining funds in England for the support of the Female Schools in India. Her work "Hindoo Female Education," published in London, 1839, had great influence in awakening public attention to the importance of providing instruction for the native female population of the East.

MADAME BOIVIN, a French woman, deserves a distinguished place among those who devote great talents to the cause of her own sex. She held, for many years, the office of Sage-Femme of the Maison des Accouchemens in Paris, and by her successful practice and excellent writings has opened the way for women to become physicians for their own sex and for children. Her medical works are held in high repute by the faculty of America as well as of France.

SUPPLEMENT.*

ADAMS, SARAH FLOWER,

Was the youngest daughter of Benjamin Flower, an English political writer and reformer of some note residing in Cambridgeshire. Her elder sister, Eliza Flower, as well as Mrs. Adams, was gifted with a rare genius, which she devoted to music.

An English critic remarks of her: "ELIZA FLOWER, in musical composition, attained a higher rank than, before her time, had been reached by any of her sex. Nor is it too much to say, that she has been excelled by no living composer in the particular order of composition to which she devoted herself. The first, and, as yet, but partial collection of her works, entitled 'Adoration, Aspiration, and Belief,' contains strains of an originality and sublimity, combined with a felicitous musical expression of words, as adapted to congregational and social worship, which have never been surpassed. Another victim of consumption, she died in 1846; and the delicate constitution of her sister gave way, and finally sunk under the blow."

Mrs. Adams was a poet; her "Vivia Perpetua" has been greatly admired. She wrote, occasionally, criticisms, but her soul was breathed forth in her devotional lyrics. She died in August, 1848; one of her own beautiful hymns, the following, was sung over her grave:

He sendeth sun, he sendeth shower,
Alike they're needful to the flower;
And joys and tears alike are sent
To give the soul fit nourishment.
As comes to me or cloud or sun,
Father! thy will, not mine, be done.

Can loving children e'er reprove
With murmurs whom they trust and love?
Creator, I would ever be
A trusting, loving child to thee;
As comes to me or cloud or sun,
Father! thy will, not mine, be done.

O, ne'er will I at life repine;
Enough that thou hast made it mine.
Where falls the shadow cold of death,
I yet will sing with parting breath,
As comes to me or shade or sun,
Father! thy will, not mine, be done.

* Notwithstanding our care, a few precious names were overlooked in their proper order; others, that were arranged in the Era of the Living when we began our Record, are now numbered amongst the dead; these are included in the Supplement

ARBOUVILLE, COUNTESS D',

Who died in April, 1850, was a woman of real genius. Her writings appeared in Paris, at first anonymously. She was by nature almost morbidly sensitive and unwilling to be known as a candidate for literary honours, but the entire success of her works made her friends desirous to claim for her the praise awarded to the author. Her first work was "Resignation," published in 1846; then appeared successively "The Village Doctor," "The Histoire Hollandaise," and a volume of poems called "The Manuscript of my Aunt," the introduction to which is a touching little story of early death. The poems are principally elegies, ballads, and verses of that unpretending order; like her prose works, they are tender, elegant, and mournful. The prominent characteristic of her tales is the poetic melancholy which inspires every thought and colours every picture. Love of the most refined, the most true, the most absorbing nature, is every where the theme; every where its victim is doomed to suffering. A dark veil shadows every scene. The delicacy of style, thought, and narrative is indescribable. Her best production is the "Histoire Hollandaise." This tale is beautifully written; it is like a strain of mournful music that rends our very souls, unbroken by a note of joy.

"Like wintry suns, it rose in tears,
Like them, in tears it set."

Very powerful is the effect of the ballads as they are introduced; like Desdemona's song of "Willow," they have a presaging woe about them that weighs upon the spirit and prepares for the coming ill. As poems of that sort they have great merit, even taken as disjecta membra.

The death of Madame d'Arbouville must be deplored as a loss to the reading world, which reasonably have anticipated admirable things from her pen.

C.

CALLCOTT, LADY,

Was the daughter of Rear-Admiral George Dundas. The following sketch is from the London Athenæum:

"Few women had seen so much of the world or travelled so much, and none, perhaps, have turned the results of their activity to more benevolent account. A great part of her early life was spent either at sea or in travel, and to the last no subject was more animating to her than a ship, and no hero excited her enthusiasm to so high a degree as Nelson.

She was born in the year 1788, and before she was twenty-one years of age she was travelling in India, the wife of Captain Thomas Graham, R. N. According to the account of her travels, she went to India in 1809 and visited all the three presidencies, making acquaintances at all of them learned for oriental knowledge and research. She visited the caves of Elephanta, the Island of Salsette, the excavations of Carli in the Mahratta Mountains, and Poonah, the Mahratta capital. On her return to Bombay she voyaged along the coast as far as Negombo, afterwards visiting Trincomali, on the east side of the Island, on her way to Madras. From Madras she went to Calcutta, which terminated her travels in India, as she only returned to the Coromandel coast to embark for England in the beginning of 1811. She published these travels in 1812, being then twenty-four years of age. Ten years afterwards she sailed with Captain Graham for South America. In the mean time she had resided in Italy and published two works; one, "Three Months in the Environs of Rome," 1820; a second, "The Memoirs of the Life of Poussin," in the same year. Captain Graham, who commanded the Dorus, died on the voyage to South America, and his remains were carried into Valparaiso and interred within the fortress. His wife was in Chili during the series of earthquakes which lasted from the 20th of November, 1823, and scarcely a day passed without receiving violent shocks. It was with difficulty she escaped from her house, which was partly laid in ruins.

During her stay in South America, Mrs. Graham became the instructress of Dona Maria, now Queen of Portugal. Some years afterwards she married Mr. Callcott, the Royal Academician, and with him again visited Italy. Among the published fruits of this tour may be mentioned Lady Callcott's account of Giotto's Chapel, at Padua; a privately printed work, with exquisite outlines—remembrances drawn by Sir Augustus Callcott—and a kind contribution to the illustrated edition of the Seven Ages of Shakspeare. Lady Callcott also published a "History of Spain," in 2 vols., in 1822; and after the commencement of her illness, arising from the rupture of a blood-vessel, she published "Essays towards the History of Painting," 1836, which involved so great an amount of labour that her declining health and strength obliged her to abandon it before completion. She died in 1843, aged fifty-five. In her character she was noble, direct, generous, forgiving, quick, sensitive, kind, sympathetic, and religious; all that knew her will hold her memory in affectionate remembrance. Her acquirements and knowledge were extensive. She was an artist, both in feeling and practice, an excellent linguist, and her memory was extremely accurate and tenacious.

None felt Lady Callcott's loss more than the little children, who were always encouraged as loved and welcome guests, and for whom her kindness had always prepared some little present of a doll. Not a small part of her last years was spent in providing amusement and instruction for them, and successfully, too; she wrote for them "Little Arthur's History of England," and a delightfully simple and natural tale, "The Little Brackenburners." Her last work was a "Scripture Herbal."

COMSTOCK, SARAH DAVIS,

Was the daughter of Robert S. Davis, of Brook line, Massachusetts. She early became a member of the Baptist church in her native town, and gave full evidence of being imbued with the self-denying spirit of a Christian. The Rev. Grover S. Comstock, a clergyman in the Baptist Church, selected her as his companion in the life of toil and hardship he had chosen as a missionary to Burmah, and she faithfully fulfilled the task she then undertook in a true martyr-spirit. In June, 1834, Mr. and Mrs. Comstock were publicly consecrated to the work in Boston, and sailed immediately for their field of labour, which they reached on the 6th of December, in the same year. In his labours between Arracan and Burmah, Mr. Comstock found his wife of great assistance. Whenever women came near their house, she would instantly leave her occupations, if possible, to tell them of the Saviour; she collected a school, translated the Scripture Catechism, and administered both medicine and advice to the sick, besides teaching her own children and attending to household duties. In the evening, whenever she could be out, she might often be found with several native women collected around her, to whom she was imparting religious knowledge.

Mrs. Comstock's faith was strong that ere long Arracan would, as a country, acknowledge God as its ruler, and in this expectation, she laboured until death came to lead her away to her infinite reward. She died of a disease peculiar to the climate on the 28th of April, 1843; leaving four children, two of whom had previously been sent to America for instruction; the other two soon followed her to the grave. Nothing could exceed the sorrow expressed by the natives for her loss. More than two thousand came on the day after her death to share their grief with her afflicted husband, who survived her loss but for a few months.

CZARTORYSKI, ISABELLA PRINCESS,

WIFE of Prince Adam Czartoryski, was born in Warsaw about the year 1743. She was a lady of refined and cultivated taste in literature, and a lover of nature. Her first published work was on "Gardens," magnificently illustrated, in which she displayed her peculiar talents and gave much valuable information. She embellished the grounds of her beautiful residence at Pulaway according to the principles set forth in her work, but she did not enjoy it long: it was confiscated to the Russians. She afterwards wrote "The Pilgrim of Doramil," based on Polish history and intended to promote morality, which work has been much admired. Her daughter has written several excellent stories depicting the manners and domestic life of the Polish peasantry. Princess Czartoryski died in 1835. Her family is a branch of the Jagellons, rightful heirs to the hereditary throne of Poland.

D.

DASHKOVA, EKATERINA ROMANOVNA,

A RUSSIAN Princess, was born in 1754. She wrote comedies and novels, such as the authors of that country prepare, containing about fifty pages per volume. She also made some valuable translations from French and Italian literature.

A Russian critic says, "Twenty or thirty pages are sufficient for a volume; 150 pages are divided into three volumes. Moreover, Russian words are of seven, eight, and ten syllables, which in English would be of only two and three syllables. Thus, 150 Russian printed pages would only fill about 60 or 80 English."

DONNE, MARIA DALLE—,

Was born 1776, in a village called Roncastaldo, eighteen miles from Bologna. Her parents were worthy people, placed in humble life, but she had an uncle who was an ecclesiastic, and he, struck with her uncommon intelligence as a child, determined to take charge of her education, and for this purpose carried her home with him to Bologna. This good priest had apartments near the medical college, and was on terms of the most intimate friendship with the celebrated and learned Dr. Luigi Rodati. The latter, observing the quick talents of the little girl, took pleasure in asking her questions to exercise her mind, and at last became so interested in her mental developments that he instructed her in Latin and the other parts of knowledge which are in general reserved for those intended for professional studies. Besides his own cares, he obtained for her the friendship and tuition of Canterzani; a man who could boast of an European reputation, as his fame for learning and knowledge extended through that continent. He was so delighted with the genius, the industry, and amiable character of Maria, that he neglected nothing to cultivate her abilities to the utmost. The most abstruse sciences were studied and thoroughly investigated, and her natural inclinations tending to medical researches, she was led to the study of comparative anatomy and experimental physic. Her masters were, besides Canterzani and Rodati, the noted surgeon, Tarsizio Riviera, a man of most profound erudition, the great physician Aldini, and the pathologist Uttini. These gentlemen, who valued Maria as much for her excellent disposition and conscientious character as for her shining qualifications, considering that she was extremely poor, deliberated whether she should assume the profession of medicine as a means of support. A deformity of the shoulders, which deprived her of a share in the ordinary amusements of young persons, seemed to isolate her among her companions; and these learned professors, perfectly convinced of her competency, persuaded her to offer herself as a candidate for a medical degree, and, by practising this useful and honorable art, to provide for herself. She, with characteristic good sense, objected that the prejudice against her sex assuming such functions would prevent her admission, whatever might be her qualifications. This was undeniable, but her friends thought if she would submit herself to a public and close examination for three days, that all prejudice must be dispelled by evident and incontrovertible facts. On the 1st of August, 1799, the vast building used for the purpose of the examination was thronged. Every man of science, every doctor, speeded to witness the defeat, as he anticipated, of this presumptuous young woman. She was modestly attired in black; her tranquil countenance and decorous mien seemed equally removed from arrogance and false shame. The ordeal she went through was of the most trying sort. Difficulties were offered that the proposers themselves were unable to solve. The candidate, without the smallest discomposure, with most profound analysis, and with the clearest reasoning, manifested her perfect acquaintance with every subject propounded. The assembly kindled into enthusiasm, and she was unanimously invested with every honour the faculty had to distribute. From that time, under the title of Doctress, she practised medicine with the greatest success. Nor was her knowledge limited to that science—it could not be denied by unwilling men, that this woman could compete with them on all points; whether of philosophy or eloquence. Her Latin speeches were second to none, and her lectures were delivered in the most elegant and forcible manner. In the sequel she was nominated Professor of Obstetrics, and presided over a school for women in that branch of medical art. To her pupils she was motherly, generous, and kind; but as an instructress she was eminently severe. She considered their functions of such importance that she exacted the most particular knowledge, and would admit no neglect.

The Doctress found time to cultivate the belles tettres, and excelled in writing both Latin and Italian verses, but of this accomplishment she thought so lightly that she never kept any copies of her productions. In music she had attained sufficient proficiency to play on the organ in her parish church, St. Caterina di Saragozza, when any emergency demanded her aid.

In 1842, this excellent, pious, and valuable woman, having dismissed her servants one evening, retired to bed. In a short time one of the women heard a slight groan from her mistress; she ran to the bed, and found her seized with apoplexy. She hurried for a physician, but it was too late; when he arrived, Maria was dead.

DRUZBACKA, ELIZABETH,

BORN in Poland in 1693, was celebrated as a poetess. She wrote some very beautiful idyls, full of the sweetest descriptions of nature, in which it is said she has excelled Thomson. She died in 1763, aged seventy years.

F

FONTAINES, MARIE LOUISE CHARLOTTE
COUNTESS DE,

WAS the daughter of the Marquis de Giorg, Governor of Metz. Mademoiselle de Giorg married the Count de Fontaines, by whom she had a son and a daughter. She died in 1730.

Madame de Fontaines acquired considerable reputation by her novels, which are of the school of Madame La Fayette, to whom she is inferior in sensibility, and in the power of developing character; the French critics pronounce her diction to be purer; a merit which resulted from the epoch when she wrote; the language being at that time more settled than it was when "The Princess of Cleves" was composed. Voltaire, who was on terms of intimate friendship with Madame Fontaines, wrote some verses in her praise, in which he equals her style to that of Fenelon. This is a very exaggerated compliment. More just and more acceptable it would have been to confess that the plot of his fine tragedy, "Tancrède," is taken from one of her novels—"The Countess of Savoy." La Harpe, in his analysis of "Tancrède," indicates its source. In this play, the great beauty of the poetry and the very interesting and powerful evolvment of the characters evince so superior a genius to the mere formation of the story, that the poet might have yielded up to the lady what was due to her without a single leaf falling from his laurel. But, man-like, he did not choose to acknowledge that he had been helped by a woman, while availing himself of the advantage.

FOUQUÉ, BARONESS CAROLINE DE LA MOTTE,

WAS the first wife of the Baron de la Motte Fouqué, so well known for his inimitable tale of Undine. She ranks among the most accomplished women of Germany. Her works are numerous, and have attained a high degree of celebrity; we will indicate a few of them: "Letters on Greek Mythology," "Letters from Berlin," "Women of the World," "Woman's Love," "The two Friends," "The Heroine of La Vendée," "Tales," in four volumes, "Theodora," "Henry and Maria," "Lodoiska and her Daughter."

G.

GERMAIN, SOPHIE,

BORN at Paris in 1776, made, at a comparatively early age, an extraordinary progress in the mathematical sciences, and, in 1816, obtained the prize of the Academy of Sciences for a memoir on the vibration of elastic laminæ. She pursued this subject further in her "Recherches sur la théorie des surfaces élastiques," published in 1820; in another memoir presented to the Academy in 1826, and in an article in the "Annales de physique et chimie," which appeared in 1828. During the revolution of the three days, she was quietly engaged at Paris in the preparation of a memoir on the curvature of surfaces, which was, when finished, inserted in Crelle's Journal of the Mathematics. She died in 1831 of a cancer. Distinguished as she was by her acquirements and performances in the exact sciences, her attention had been far from being exclusively confined to them, but was, on the contrary, directed, in no inconsiderable degree, also to natural science, geography, history, and the speculations of philosophy.

HALL, SARAH,

BORN at Philadelphia on the 30th of October, 1761, was daughter of the Rev. John Ewing, D D., who was for many years Provost of the University of Pennsylvania, and Pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia. Although brought up in the troublesome times of the Revolution, and when it was not customary to bestow much cultivation on the female mind, with access to few books or other of the usual means of study, Miss Ewing became the mistress of accomplishments such as few possess. From her earliest years her active and inquisitive mind was ever on the alert for knowledge, and, fortunately, she possessed, in the society of her father — one of the most distinguished scholars of his day — a prolific source of information, which she failed not to improve to the utmost. By means of conversations with him, and observing the heavenly bodies under his direction, she became quite a proficient in the science of astronomy, which, through her whole life, continued one of her favourite pursuits. She also obtained a critical acquaintance with the principles of grammar, and an extensive knowledge of the ancient classics, by hearing her brothers recite their Latin and Greek lessons to their father, and by listening to the conversations of the learned men who frequented his house. True genius is stimulated to exertion by the obstacles that embarrass it in the pursuit of knowledge; and in the case of Miss Ewing the difficulties which she was obliged to surmount only served to redouble her industry and to give increased value to the hard-earned acquisitions of her mind.

In 1782, Miss Ewing was married to Mr. John Hall, the son of a wealthy planter in Maryland, to which state they removed. Here she spent about eight years; but her taste was not for retirement; she loved books, society, and her friends too well to be satisfied with a country life in a secluded neighbourhood, and they removed to Philadelphia, where Mr. Hall filled successively the offices of Secretary of the Land Office, and Marshal of the United States for the District of Pennsylvania. Here they remained till 1801; then they resided in Lambertton, New Jersey, till 1805; thence they removed to Mr. Hall's paternal estate, in Maryland, where they lived until 1811; they then returned to Philadelphia, where Mr. Hall died, in 1826. Mrs. Hall survived her husband only four years, dying on the 8th of April, 1830, aged sixty-nine.

During all these removals and the vicissitudes which occasioned them, Mrs. Hall never neglected, in the least particular, her duties as the head of a family; and in order to find time for reading without infringing on them, she, for the last forty years of her life, devoted to this exercise the hours usually appropriated to repose.

When the Port Folio was established by Dennie, in 1800, she was one of the literary circle to whom that work was indebted for its celebrity. Some of the most sprightly essays and pointed criticisms which appeared in this paper at the time of its greatest popularity, were from the pen of Mrs. Hall. When the Port Folio came under the direction of her son, she continually aided him in his labours; and her contributions may readily be distinguished, as well by their vivacity, as the classic purity of their diction. She was an admirable letter-writer, and possessed uncommon powers of conversation, which she exercised in a manner at once instructive and entertaining. While her children were young, it was her practice to allure their minds to study by such conversation as would awaken curiosity and give a proper direction to the taste, the judgment, and the heart; and, instead of influencing them by authority in the choice of books, to instil into them such principles as would induce them to make the proper selection.

Throughout her whole life Mrs. Hall was always a sincere and humble Christian; and, although an innate delicacy of mind induced her to withhold the expression of every thought and feeling which concerned only herself, yet she was remarkably exact in her religious observances, and assiduous in teaching not only her children, but all within her influence, that belief and those hopes which formed the consolation of her own life. She delighted to converse on religious topics, and few men excelled her in profound knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. She studied these with diligence and prayer, and became as eminent for scholarship in this department of learning, as she was for wit, vivacity, and genius. The only book she ever published, "Conversations on the Bible," a duodecimo of 365 pages, affords ample testimony that her memory is entitled to such praise. This work, which was very well received, both in this country and in England, contains a fund of information which could only have been collected by diligent research and profound thought. While engaged in this undertaking she began the study of the Hebrew, to enable herself to make the necessary researches, and attained a considerable proficiency in this difficult language. When it is stated that Mrs. Hall commenced this work after she had passed the age of fifty, when she had been the mother of eleven children, and that during her whole life she was distinguished for her industry, economy, and attention to all the duties of her station, it must be allowed that she was no ordinary woman. Her other writings were confined to contributions to the leading literary periodicals of the day.

HARCOURT, AGNES D,

ABBESS of the celebrated convent of Longchamp, near Paris, founded by the pious sister of St. Louis, Isabella de France, was the daughter of Juan d'Harcourt. She was appointed Abbess in 1263, two years after the establishment of the convent, by Isabella, and remained so till her death, in November, 1291. Agnes had received an education worthy of her illustrious birth, as was fully proved by the work she left: it was the "Life of Isabella," written with so much naïveté and such an exquisite simplicity, as to be considered one of the most valuable works of the early French writers. Before the revolution of 1789, the Abbey of Longchamp possessed the original manuscript of this work, written with the greatest care, perhaps by Agnes herself, on a roll of vellum.

HAYS, MARY,

AN Englishwoman of good talents, who made the condition and welfare of her own sex her chief object of study. Her only work of consequence was entitled "Female Biography; or Memoirs of Illustrious and Celebrated Women of all Ages and Countries;" in three volumes.

I.

JAMES, ANNIE P.,

WAS born in Salem, Massachusetts, on the 22d of December, 1825. Daughter of Mr. Joshua Safford, of that city, she was carefully educated by her parents. When less than ten years of age she commenced a journal, which she continued till her death; and even at that early age she evinced a mind of unusual capacity and depth, and a lovely disposition. In September, 1842, Miss Safford became a member of the Baptist Church in Salem, of which she afterwards was so bright an ornament. From the time of her first union with the church she was deeply interested in the missionary cause, and was elected Corresponding Secretary of the "Boardman Missionary Society." In the early part of 1847, Dr. Sexton James, of Philadelphia, about to become a missionary to China, visited Salem and was introduced to Miss Safford. The intimacy ended in a marriage, which took place in October of the same year, and in November they set sail for China. They arrived at Hong-kong on the 25th of March, 1848, and a few days after went on a visit to Canton, as there was no prospect of their having an opportunity to proceed to Shanghai, their place of destination, for some weeks. On the 13th of April, Dr. and Mrs. James embarked on board the schooner "Paradox" to return to Hong-kong, and on the 15th, just as they came in sight of the port, a sudden squall came up. The schooner was thrown on her side and sunk almost instantly. Dr. James and his wife were in their cabin, and, it is supposed, were drowned immediately. Their bodies were never recovered.

J.

JOAN, THE POPESS,

ACCORDING to a story long believed but now acknowledged to be a fiction, was a woman who, for a time, held the keys of St. Peter, and was the acknowledged head of the Roman hierarchy. The legend says that she was a native of Metz. Her name was Gilberta, or Agnes; she fell in love with an Englishman at Fulda, went to travel with him, studied at Athens, and visited Rome. Continuing to conceal her sex, she took the name of Johannes Angelina, and rose, by her talents, from the station of a notary to the papal chair under the name of John VIII. This was between the years 854-6. She governed well, but, having become pregnant by a servant, or, as some say, by a cardinal, she was delivered in a solemn procession, and died on the spot, near the Coliseum, which place the popes are said to have avoided ever after in their processions. Such is the fable, which we give solely because it is found in so many authors, though it is unworthy of credit. Two Protestants, learned and impartial men, (Blondell and Bayle,) concur in their conclusion that the story of Pope Joan is a baseless fiction.

LLANGOLLEN, THE LADIES OF,

THAT happiness is to be sought in the obvious paths of that state of life in which it has pleased God to place us, that the largest heart and most excited heroism of virtue may find scope in the duties that lie nearest to us, are truths that have been demonstrated for ages. But there is a sort of Quixotism in some minds that spurns the condition allotted by Providence. These people try to "go farther" than the rest of the world, and, it must be added, they invariably "fare worse."

Lady Eleanor Butler was born in Dublin, 1761. While in her cradle she had the misfortune to lose both her parents, and from her earliest recollection she formed a tender intimacy with Miss Ponsonby, their imaginations being incited by the circumstances — that they were born in Dublin on the same day of the year, and both lost their parents at the same epoch. It was easy for two romantic, warm-hearted girls, to persuade themselves that they were born for each other, and that they would renounce all other ties, and fly to a solitude where friendship was to supply the charm for every care. Thus agreeing together, they fled secretly from Ireland, and, having heard of the romantic beauties of Wales, they went to Llangollen, took a cottage beautifully situated near the top of a mountain, and commenced their life of friendship. However, their guardians having discovered their retreat, compelled them to return to Dublin. The young ladies were obliged to submit, but declared that on coming of age they would return to Llangollen; which they did.

Miss Ponsonby was not rich, but Lady Eleanor possessed considerable property. She purchased the cottage, and built upon its site an elegant residence, replete with every comfort and luxury they desired. Here they actually dwelt for the remainder of their lives, which were lengthened to old age. They were visited by many strangers, and enjoyed such society, though professing to love solitude. As they grew old and the romance of the situation faded, their latest visitors represent them as insipid old women, eagerly listening to news of the world, and seeming to derive their principal amusement from superintending the farm. Miss Ponsonby, unfortunately, survived her friend for many tedious years. The blank that remained to her may be imagined. She died about 1830; the exact date we have not ascertained.

LEE, MARY ELIZABETH,

A WRITER of prose and verse, was born at Charleston, South Carolina, on the 23d March, 1813. She belonged to an old family which had always maintained a highly respectable rank in society. Mary at a very early period evinced the possession of a delicate and sensitive organization with large promise of talent. She was fortunate in early literary associations, which, in a considerable degree, were made to supply the want of a close and methodical education. She soon exhibited an eager appetite for books. For these she abandoned the usual amusements of childhood. Indeed, she never entertained them. The toy and the doll, so essential to juvenile happiness, contributed at no period to hers. Her pleasures were derived wholly from reading, and the conversation of those whose attachment to letters was decided. In this way she added daily to her intellectual resources, and stimulated, even to excess, the sole desire of her mind. Her memory was one of remarkable capacity, and she retained without an effort whatever commended itself to her imagination. She thus laid in rare stores for thought, which, as she advanced to maturity, were never left unemployed. Her faculty for the acquisition of languages, with or without a tutor, was singularly large; and, with a memory so retentive as that which she possessed, it was never exercised in vain. Until the age of ten, her education was entirely carried on at home. When, at this period, it was deemed advisable to enlarge her studies in accordance with the increasing developments of her mind, and she was sent to school, its exercises and excitements were found to prey upon her delicate constitution. The very emulation which such an institution almost necessarily provokes in an ardent and eager nature, was injurious to hers. Her health became impaired, and it was found necessary when she was but twelve years of age to withdraw her once more to the placid sphere of domestic study. Here, then, and almost at this early period, she began the education of herself—that most valuable of all kinds of education, and the only one which makes school education of value. In the securities of home she pursued her voluntary tasks with equal industry and pleasure. Her application was sleepless, her acquisitions surprising. She succeeded in obtaining a considerable mastery over the French, Italian, and German languages, while perfecting herself by constant attention in all the graces of her own. In these exercises she naturally became a contributor to the periodical literature of the country. Her vein was at once direct and delicate; simple, unaffected, and truthful, yet full of grace, sweetness, and beauty. Her tone was grave, mostly, almost to solemnity, yet relieved and warmed by a fancy that, if never frolicsome, was at least usually cheerful. With her increasing reputation, her verses soon made their way into most of the popular periodicals of the day. Several of her pieces fastened themselves upon the memory, and became grateful to the hearts, of her readers. Their unobtrusive sweetness, their grave delicacy, the propriety of their sentiments, and uniform gentleness and purity of tone, beguiled those sympathies which the delicate constitution of her genius would never have sought to coerce. "The Lone Star," "Correggio's Holy Family," "The Hour of Death," "The Deathbed of Prince Henry," "The Blind Negro Communicant," and many other pieces, in this manner stole silently upon the popular affections and served to extend her reputation. Her practice in verse, as is commonly the case, preceded her exercises in prose. At a later day she became as diligent in the latter as in the former province. Essays, sketches, tales, all proceeded rapidly from her pen, and were eagerly read in the annuals and magazines into which they found their way. Sometimes she ventured upon a critical paper for the reviews, and, through this medium she has given us some just and thoughtful criticisms upon foreign writers. One volume, designed by her for the young, entitled "Social Evenings, or Historical Tales," was published by the Massachusetts School Library Association, and is stated to be one of the most popular of the collection. Its characteristics are simplicity, good sense, accuracy of statement, and compactness of detail, all carefully chosen and grouped in accordance with the leading purpose of the publication. At a later period in life her labours were continued amidst great suffering, and with a constant apprehension of a fatal termination. Her constitution, always delicate, was gradually yielding to her complaint, which was assisted in its progress by the intense activity of her mind. But this very activity, which helped her foe, was her principal solace. Of the tenacity with which she held to her employments we may form some notion from a single fact. Her right hand having become paralyzed, she transferred the pen to the left, and acquired a new style of penmanship, which, entirely different from that which she wrote before, is yet singularly uniform, and even spirited and graceful. She bore her afflictions with a wonderful fortitude, a sweet, becoming cheerfulness, and a still unwearied exercise of her mental faculties, all concurring to illustrate the pure and noble Christian spirit, the cultivation of which had been carefully blended with that of her intellectual and moral nature. After years of suffering, she expired peacefully and hopefully in the arms of her family, on the 23d of September, 1849, at the early age of thirty-six. A selection from her poetical writings has recently been made and published in Charleston by Messrs Walker and Richards in a beautiful duodecimo of 224 pages

A tolerable portrait prefaces this volume, which has been edited, with a touching and graceful memoir, by her friend and pastor, the Rev. S. Gilman, D. D.

LÉZARDIÈRE, MADEMOISELLE,

WAS a native of France. Without any encouragement she manifested an invincible taste for historical researches. In this she met with great opposition from her family. At a period when France, as a nation, was given up to most frivolous pursuits, when the court was occupied entirely by futile pleasures, to say no worse, it seemed monstrous, and inadmissible to commonplace people, that a young girl should give up the world, and the usual routine of girlish life, to devote herself to musty manuscripts and severe study. Her perseverance, however, removed all obstacles, and she was at last indulged by her parents with the means of carrying out her views. She devoted the best years of her youth to the most laborious literary pursuits; living in solitude, unknown by the public, but encouraged by the approbation and sympathy of a few scientific men, among whom her principal friend was Malesherbes, the heroic advocate of Louis XVI. After twenty-five years of careful research, her work was printed anonymously, under the title of "Theory of the Political Laws of the French Monarchy." Alas! the book was printed in 1790, when the very word monarchy was an abomination. It was published after the Revolution, but the time was past; political science had also undergone a revolution, and the labours of a lifetime were lost. Augustin Thierry, unquestionably the best judge in the world of the subject of Mademoiselle Lézardièrè, since his own writings have formed an epoch in the manner of studying and treating such researches, gives her almost the preference over all the learned men who were her predecessors in this study. He speaks highly of her erudition and philosophic mode of reasoning; her theory he completely destroys, as he does those of all the foregoing savants, not excepting the great Montesquieu. After refuting her errors, he says,—

"We must admit, however, that the theory of Mademoiselle Lézardièrè is consistent, ingenious, and often full of sagacity. She appears gifted with remarkable powers of analysis. She seeks out and sets forth all the important problems, and never leaves them till she has exhausted every text that bears upon them. In a word, there is not here, as in the preceding systems, an aimless scattering of the primitive elements of our history; they are all recognised and admitted; and it is by an almost insensible inflection that the author has bent them to her own system. * * *

If her book had appeared at the right time, perhaps it would have divided public opinion and have founded a sect, like the system of Mably; perhaps, as it is more complete, more profound, and nearer the originals, it would have gained the suffrage of the deepest thinkers. In reality the two theories are much alike: the same element is in the book of Abe Mably, but in that of Mademoiselle Lézardièrè it is more strongly marked, and, above all, more learnedly argued."

The science of political history is so difficult, and demands so much learning, that few have written sagaciously upon it, and we have, therefore, given Mademoiselle Lézardièrè the honourable testimony of Thierry, which her merit had well earned.

M.

MACOMBER, ELEANOR,

WAS born in 1801, at Lake Pleasant, Hamilton County, New York. Here her childhood and youth were passed until she removed to Albany, where she first formed that determination to which she adhered so nobly through all obstacles—of devoting her life to Him who had given up His for us. In 1830 she was sent out by the Missionary Board of the Baptist denomination as teacher among the Ojibwas at Sault de Ste Marie, in Michigan. Here she continued for nearly four years, when, her health failing, she returned to her friends. In 1836 she connected herself with the Karen mission, Burmah, and went out to Maulmain in the latter part of the same year. After her arrival she was stationed at Dong-Yahn, about thirty-five miles from Maulmain. Here she lived and laboured almost alone, doing the great work which was assigned her. In the midst of discouragements she fainted not, but performed labours and endured afflictions almost incredible. When she arrived at the scene of her future labours, she found vice and sin reigning triumphant. On every hand intemperance and sensuality were observable. She immediately commenced in their midst the worship of God. On the Sabbath the people were drawn together to hear the story of the cross, and during the week her house was thrown open for morning and evening prayers. By her perseverance she soon collected a small school, and, in less than a year, a church of natives, numbering more than twenty persons, was formed and placed under the care of the Rev. Mr. Stephens. Intemperance, sensuality, and other vices gradually disappeared, and the Christian virtues took their place.

The idea of a weak, friendless, and lone woman trusting herself among a drunken and sensual people, and there, with no husband, father, or brother, establishing public worship, opening her house for prayer and praise, and gathering schools in the midst of wild and unlettered natives, is one full of moral grandeur. Intelligent, active, and laborious, Miss Macomber was not content with teaching all who came to her; she went out to the surrounding tribes, attended only by one or two converts, and, fording rivers, crossing ravines, climbing high hills and mountains, she everywhere carried the doctrines of salvation. Even the heathen heart was touched by this spectacle, and this estimable woman was respected and loved by those who hated the Gospel she taught.

Miss Macomber died April 16th, 1840, of the jungle fever, at Maulmain, where she had been carried for the purpose of obtaining medical aid.

her death was deeply lamented by the natives; even those who did not love the Saviour mourned the loss of His servant, whose kindness and hospitality they had experienced, and followed her to the grave with wails of sorrow.

M'CREA, JANE,

DAUGHTER of James M'Crea, an Episcopal clergyman of New Jersey, was residing in 1777, with her brother, near Fort Edward, on the western bank of the Hudson. She was betrothed to a young royalist named David Jones, a captain in Burgoyne's army. He sent a number of Indians with a letter to her, urging her to place herself under their escort and to come to him. Fearful of some mischance, Captain Jones despatched another party of Indians on the same errand. These two bands meeting, began to dispute about the reward that was to be divided between them; violent words followed, and, in the midst of the quarrel, one of the chiefs shot Miss M'Crea. She fell immediately, and the Indian scalped her; and then, fearful of pursuit, they all fled. Her brother, hearing of his sister's fate, came and buried the body. Captain Jones did not long survive this sad disaster.

MATILDA,

QUEEN of Henry I. of England, daughter of Malcolm Canmore, king of Scotland. See her biography in Second Era, page 131.

MARTIN, MRS. BELL,

WAS daughter of the rich Mr. Martin, of Conemara, Ireland. She inherited a very large landed property in that country.

Miss Martin married her cousin, whose name was Bell; he took her family name by act of Parliament. Mrs. Bell Martin was an authoress of some repute. She wrote "Julia Howard," a novel of considerable merit, and also several works in the French language. But she was more eminent for her virtues than her genius: During the troublous times of the famine in Ireland, Mrs. Bell Martin attempted, in the spirit of true humanity, to prevent the poor people on her estates from suffering the horrible privations endured by the labourers in general. Her tenants amounted to as many as twenty thousand, and her lands to over two hundred thousand acres. She caused important improvements to be made, in order to give work and wages to the people, till her own means became nearly exhausted. Obligated to retrench her expenditures, she left her own country to travel in America and learn the manner of living in a republic where all are in comfort. She was taken ill on the voyage, and died ten days after reaching New York, near the close of 1850

MAURY, MRS.,

OF Liverpool, England, wrote two works on the United States, "The English Woman in America," and "The Statesmen of America." We have had such frequent occasions to resent the want of candour in British tourists; we have so fretted and winced at their merited and unmerited sneers, that when we find one willing to love us and our faults, gratitude and patriotism arise to disarm criticism. We are truly obliged to Mrs. Maury for her enthusiasm; and we say, not ungraciously but deprecatingly, that too much praise is the next thing to too much blame, as it spirits up our ill-wishers to question our veritable deserts. Setting aside this engouement for every thing American, Mrs. Maury is an agreeable, ingenious writer; some of her sketches of insignificant people are painted with a vigour and animation that would do credit to certain of the great literary reputations of the day. Mrs. Maury's enthusiasm for every thing in the New World was no doubt to be attributed, in part, to the circumstance that Mr. Maury was an American by birth. His native State was Virginia, and hither the family came in 1848; Mrs. Maury anticipating much happiness in this, her adopted country. But she was not to realize her hopes here; she died in a few months after her settlement on their estate in Virginia.

MAYO, ABIGAIL,

WIFE of Colonel John Mayo, of Richmond, Virginia, did much for the cause of female education in that city and state. Gifted with a superior mind and great moral excellence, she understood, intuitively, as it were, the good influence that cultivated intellect gives the sex. There were no Female Seminaries then at the South; those who wished to give their daughters the advantages of education were obliged to send them from home, or keep a governess in their own family. Mrs. Mayo resolved to remedy this; she established a school, placing at its head Mrs. Broome, niece of Lord Nugent, and cousin of Lord Byron, an English lady, who, leaving Canada for the United States, had been befriended by Mrs. Mayo. The Seminary was successful. Two of Mrs. Mayo's daughters, one now the wife of General Scott, the other of Dr. R. H. Cabell, of Richmond, were among the accomplished pupils educated in this school. The good effect of the experiment has never been lost. Richmond has since been famed for its excellent Female Seminaries.

MIRBEL, LEZINSKA RUE DE,

WAS born at Paris, daughter of a commissary of the marine. She belonged to a family, every branch of which was opulent, except her own. Nature had endowed her, however, with a firmness of character and a loftiness of spirit which rendered poverty honourable, as, instead of degrading, it spurred her to those exertions which have given her name a European celebrity. She determined, at a very early age, to accomplish an object which she set before herself; that was, to become independent by her own efforts, and to supply the wants of her mother and her young brother. After long and due consideration, she determined upon applying herself to miniature painting, which she felt was her particular vocation. She was then eighteen, and remarkable for beauty and intelligence. Having entered herself as a student with Augustin, she regulated her hours upon the strictest rules of industry and method; every moment had its employment; a time was allotted to the necessary practice of her art; a time to reading, and a time to needle-work. Up at four o'clock in the morning, she was always ready and never hurried; the evening she devoted to society, and the day to the most persevering labours. Her youthful spirit knew no languor, either moral or physical. Filling her place gracefully in the drawing-room, in the studio she was the most severe and indefatigable of students. Preparing by earnest and fatiguing application her distant future success—

“For sluggard's brows the laurel never grows
Renown is not the child of indolent repose.”

The besetting sin of miniature painters is want of skill in drawing; Augustin could teach her the way of mixing and laying on colours, and the little mysteries of the trade; but this was not art, it was not drawing. A friend of her family, M. Belloc, a very distinguished connoisseur, advised her to withdraw from the school of Augustin, and to give herself up exclusively and strenuously to the study of drawing. She took this judicious advice, and under his friendly direction applied herself to copy the greatest masters of her special branch of art. Her talent became rapidly developed, and she soon acquired a distinguished reputation. After her marriage with M. de Mirbel, she continued her efforts for improvement, which were attended by fame, fortune, and success. While the merit of her miniatures was acknowledged all over Europe, her charming manners and intelligent mind rendered her house the resort of the most distinguished literary and artistic personages of the day. She died in September, 1849, deeply regretted by all who could estimate her genius and worth.

MOSEBY, MARY WEBSTER,

WIFE of John G. Moseby, Esq., of Richmond, Virginia, was gifted with poetic genius of no ordinary power. Her only published work was of undoubted merit, “Pocahontas, a Legend; with Historical and Traditional Notes;” issued in 1840. She also wrote for periodicals, and was highly esteemed for her virtues and literary accomplishments. Deeply versed in the holy Scriptures, and giving much time to Biblical researches, she was always at home on religious topics; and fervent piety was the loveliest attribute of her genius. Her father was Mr. Robert Pleasants, and she was connected by blood with the Randolph family. Mrs. Moseby died in Richmond city in 1844, aged fifty-two.

N.

NORDENFLYCHT, MADAME,

WAS a Swedish writer of popular songs, which, in her day, gained her great celebrity. She also wrote a volume of elegies and epistles, remarkable for their truth and tenderness. They spread her reputation far beyond her own country; Gesner, Haller, and Holberg, have each celebrated her talents. She had retired from the world on the loss of her husband, and in this retirement wrote her sweet verses. This drew intellectual people to her house, and very soon her drawing-room was the focus of the first literary society formed in Sweden; and this habit of meeting was continued weekly after the death of Madame Nordenflycht, under the classical title of “Utile Dulci.”

O.

ORLEANS, MARIE D'

WAS the third daughter of Louis Philippe, the king of the French. Her genius was the pride of her family, and her early death was a sore affliction, for she possessed great loveliness of character, and her piety and intelligence made her truly beloved and respected. Early manifesting artistic talent, and having made good proficiency in drawing and painting, she essayed her powers as a sculptor. Several of her productions in marble won the critical commendation of the best judges, not over-willing to concede this laurel to a woman, even though a king's daughter. She finally determined to attempt a work which would be associated with the most wonderful epoch of French history, and one of the most noble heroines the world has ever produced. This was the figure of Joan of Arc, completed in 1836, which places the artist at the head of the French sculptors. It may very confidently be predicted that, in future years, when the late political agitations and mutations in the Orleans family will occupy an unregarded page of general history, when the Ulyssean craft of the father and the “regal alliance” of the sons will be of no interest to mankind, then the immortal fruits of the genius of this unassuming young woman will cast a lustre over the name of Orleans.

In the fourteenth and beginning of the fifteenth centuries, amidst the disgusting barbarities, the perfidious warfare, the licentiousness, that form the annals of that most disgraceful period of French history, what name is it that we turn to with interest, what figure do we contemplate with some congeniality? Not the brute warriors, nor manœuvring statesmen, but the poet, Charles d'Orleans, whose verses, from their national spirit, paved the way to the deliverance and regeneration afterwards effected by the maiden of Domremy.

P.

PICKERING, ELLEN,

AN English novel-writer, of whom it may truly be said that she has given more innocent amusement in the way of this literature, with less of dangerous excitement, than any one author of her class. She wrote rapidly, having in the course of a few years sent forth a dozen or more of works; among which, "The Grumbler;" "The Fright;" "Nan Darrell;" and "The Quiet Husband," are distinguished for the unflagging interest, for different causes, which they exercise over the imagination of young readers.

Miss Pickering, judging from her books, must have had a mind which felt and cultivated the feminine qualities of delicacy, honesty, purity; her principles are excellent; nothing coarse in thought or language ever sullied her page. Her enthusiasm is always in favour of virtue and truth. But she too often sacrifices probability to the wish of showing the perfection of her heroine in the most attractive light. For instance, the "Admirable Crichton" could hardly have equalled the facility with which her poor heroine, under the most unpromising circumstances, becomes perfectly accomplished; arts and sciences which usually require time, money, excellent instructors, are attained by her in one brief visit, where a well-educated friend imparts both practice and theory; or the crumbs, let fall by a half-educated governess, work miracles for the neglected child. The young lady, too, is at fifteen or sixteen equal to the most complicated situations; her judgment is never at fault; and as to human frailty, that is an inadmissible supposition.

As a pendant, the uncle, grandfather, cousin, or whoever may be the oppressor, is a wretch quite devoid of the milk of human kindness. All the mixed motives that sway this earth's denizens have been without impression upon the adamant of his heart, until the right moment comes for him to show the sunny side of his nature; the habits of thirty or forty years are then laid aside as easily as gloves when we return from a walk. These are blemishes in the character of Miss Pickering's novels, and may have an injurious influence on those who expect to realize scenes similar in actual life. But the author is always sedulous to point a wise moral, though not always judicious in the means.

Miss Pickering's last work was "The Grandfather," which she did not live to finish. She died near London, in 1843. The novel was completed by her friend, Elizabeth Youatt, and published in 1844. All her works have been republished in the United States, and widely circulated, in the cheap form principally

PRINCESS ELIZABETH,

Of France, sister of Louis XVI. See page 303.

QUEENSBURY, CATHERINE HYDE, DUCHESS OF,

Was the daughter of Henry, Earl of Clarendon and Rochester, and wife of Charles Douglas, third duke of Queensbury. She was a celebrated beauty, and received tributes from Pope and from Prior. Forty years after the well-known poem of Prior, Walpole left on her toilet the following doggerel lines:—

"To many a Kitty, Love his car.
Would for a day engage,
But Prior's Kitty, ever fair,
Retains it for an age."

A forgotten poet, Whitehead, has celebrated her octogenary charms. Since the Grecian Helen, no lady seems so nearly to have filled a century of praise. What is rare in a woman so admired, she was modest, unaffected, devoted to her family and friends. She and the duke were fond of literary society, and maintained an intimacy with Swift, Pope, and especially Gay. To the last, the duchess was unspeakably kind; she not only gave him the shelter of her roof, but paid attention to the minute, every-day comforts, which the unpractical poet could never manage for himself. At the prohibition of his opera, "Polly," their graces were so warm in their resentment, that they were forbidden to appear at court. The duchess corresponded with many persons of note; her letters are to be met with dispersed among the collections that are brought forward for the gratification of modern curiosity. They exhibit considerable sprightliness and good sense. The style is unstudied, but not defective. The following extract may be made, as it is pleasing to see the tenderness of heart it shows. Gay had been dead two years at the time it was written.

— — — — — “For four or five years last past, we had set our hearts on a certain hill, that I am sure you have heard me mention; and now, not only of that, but of the whole estate we are in possession, and as yet I have not felt delighted, only mighty well satisfied. Is not this astonishing? I often want poor Mr. Gay, and on this occasion extremely. Nothing evaporates sooner than joy untold, or even told, unless to one so entirely in your interest as he was, who bore at least an equal share in every satisfaction or dissatisfaction that attended us. I am not in the spleen that I write thus; on the contrary, it is a sort of pleasure to think over his good qualities. His loss was really great, but it is a satisfaction to have once known so good a man. As you were as much his friend as I, it is needless to ask your pardon for dwelling so long on this subject.”

Besides her fondness for literature, the duchess had a taste for painting, in which art she was something of a proficient. She died in 1777, surviving her husband one year.

ROBERTS, EMMA,

Was born about the year 1794, and descended from a Welsh family of great respectability. After her father's decease, Emma Roberts, who was the younger of two sisters, resided with her mother, a lady of some literary pretensions, in the city of Bath, where she early devoted herself to the acquisition of knowledge. While prosecuting her researches for her first literary performance, she evinced so much diligence and perseverance, that the officers of the British Museum, where she was accustomed to study, were induced to render her every assistance in their power. This work was published in two volumes, in 1827, under the title of “Memoirs of the Rival Houses of York and Lancaster; or the White and Red Roses,” and, although it is written in a perspicuous and pleasing manner, yet it did not meet with that success to which it was entitled by its merits.

On the death of her mother, and the marriage of her sister to Captain R. A. M'Naughten, of the Bengal army, Miss Roberts was induced to accompany her brother-in-law and sister to India, in 1828, where she spent the two following years between the stations of Agra, Cawnpore, and Etawa, in the upper provinces of the Bengal Presidency. A spirited account of these places subsequently appeared from her pen in “The Asiatic Journal,” the first description being published in December, 1832. A selection of these papers was made in 1835, under the title of “Scenes and Characteristics of Hindoostan,” and, unlike most works upon India, it met with a favourable reception from the English public. During her residence at Cawnpore, Miss Roberts published a little volume of poetry, entitled “Oriental Scenes,” which she dedicated to her friend, Miss Landon. It was republished in England, in 1832, and contains some very pleasing specimens of glowing description and graceful imagery.

The death of her sister, which took place in 1831, caused Miss Roberts to return to Calcutta. Here her pen was in constant activity, and, besides various contributions to periodicals, she undertook the task of editing a newspaper — “The Oriental Observer.” After residing for a year in Calcutta, the loss of her health forced her to return home, and she reached London in 1833. Here she continued her literary efforts, and the amount of labour performed by her would appear astonishing to any one who did not know her industry and readiness in composition. History, biography, poetry, tales, local descriptions, foreign correspondence, and didactic essays, by turns employed her versatile powers. She also edited “The Sixty-fourth Edition of Mrs. Rundle's New System of Cookery, &c.,” to which she added several receipts of her own. A pleasing biographical sketch of Mrs. Maclean, or L. E. L., was also written by the same lady, which was published with “The Zenena, and other Poems,” in 1840. In the fall of 1839, Miss Roberts formed the bold design of travelling to India through Egypt, accompanied only by a female friend. Previous to her departure she entered into an agreement with the Asiatic Journal to transmit, on her journey, a series of papers for publication descriptive of her route. The last of these communications appeared in the same number which announced her death; and since then they have been collected and published under the title of “Notes of an Overland Journey through France and Egypt, to Bombay, by the late Miss Emma Roberts.”

On the evening of the 29th of October, Miss Roberts and her friend landed in the harbour of Bombay, having been less than two months in performing their hurried journey from London. Her aid was almost immediately requested by the conductors of periodical works at Bombay, and she likewise undertook the editorship of a new weekly paper — “The Bombay United Service Gazette.” She also engaged in schemes for improving the condition of the native women, by devising employment for them suited to their taste and capacity, and in her “Notes” appear some sensible remarks on native education.

These multifarious engagements in a tropical climate soon proved too much for Miss Roberts' constitution, already weakened by excessive exertion. She died suddenly, on the 16th of September, 1840, while on a visit to a friend at Poonah, and was buried near Mrs. Fletcher; better known to the English world by her maiden name of Jewsbury. The death of Miss Roberts excited universal sorrow, among both natives and Europeans, in India, and many flattering tributes were paid to her memory in the public journals.

REEVE, CLARA,

Was born in 1745, at Ipswich, England, daughter of a clergyman. An early admiration of Horace Walpole's “Castle of Otranto” induced Miss Reeve to imitate it in a Gothic story entitled “The Old English Baron.” Mr. Chambers, in his Cyclopædia, says of this work, —

“In some respects the lady has the advantage of Walpole: her supernatural machinery is better managed, so as to produce mysteriousness and effect, but her style has not the point or elegance of that of her prototype. Miss Reeve wrote several other novels, 'all marked,' says Sir Walter Scott, 'by excellent good sense, pure morality, and a competent command of those qualities which constitute a good romance.' They have failed, however, to keep possession of public favour, and the fame of the author rests on her 'Old English Baron,' which is now generally printed along with the story of Walpole."

"The Old English Baron" was published in 1777, and Miss Reeve died in 1803.

S.

SAUSSURE, MADAME NECKER DE,

Was the daughter of M. de Saussure, and born in the city of Geneva about the year 1768. Her father, a man of profound learning, was very careful to cultivate the mind of his daughter, and yet very fearful she would display her learning pedantically.

At the age of nineteen she married M. Necker, nephew of the celebrated minister of finance, and, as was then considered, very brilliant prospects opened before the young couple. The Revolution destroyed these hopes, but it brought the uncle and nephew and their families together, and Madame de Saussure became intimate with Madame de Staël. "From that time my thoughts were more particularly directed towards moral science and literature," says Madame de Saussure, in a letter to an American friend.*

The troubles of Geneva obliging M. Saussure and his family to pass some years in Switzerland, where the education of their children became the chief occupation of both parents, it was not till after the decease of her husband that Madame de Saussure began to publish her writings: she thus describes her feelings and opinions on her own authorship:

"It was not until my youth had passed that I appeared before the public under my own name, and I congratulate myself that it was so. The works that I should have written in early life would not have satisfied me now. The attempt to write would probably have been beneficial to me; but there are so many causes of excitement in early life, personal affections and the desire to win the love and esteem of others occupy the mind so fully, that the young rarely press steadily onward to the most elevated mark. My education had been of an exciting nature, and the circumstances of my life were calculated to foster a spirit of romance. It is very probable, therefore, that my early writings would have been imbued with more fancy than good sense. In this last of all my works that I now send you, I have believed it my duty to paint the destiny of woman, dark as the pictures may be, in true colours; but possibly the recollections and habits of youth have acquired too much power over me. You will judge. But I hope that, at least, age, deafness, sorrows, and the active duties of religion, have rendered my motives simple and pure, and have formed, in some respects, such a character as I have portrayed for the example of others."

"The last of all her works" to which she alludes, was "Progressive Education;" her best and most important production. It was translated into English and published in Boston. It deserves to have a place in every mother's library.

Madame de Saussure also wrote a "Biography of Madame de Staël," and translated from the German Schlegel's "Course of Dramatic Literature;" but her most earnest efforts were directed to the cause of education. She does not evince brilliancy of genius, yet few, if any, of the French female writers have displayed such good sense and Christian principles in their productions. She died in 1847.

SCOTT, JULIA H.,

Was born in 1809, in the northern part of Pennsylvania. Her maiden name was Kinney. She began to write verses when she was very young, and her first pieces were published when she was little more than sixteen. For several years Miss Kinney continued to write with much ability for several of the different periodicals. In 1835 she was married to Dr. David L. Scott, of Towanda, where she died in 1842. Her poems, together with a biography of the writer, by Miss S. C. Edgerton, were published in 1843. Her songs are those of "the household;" full of gentle and feminine feeling and tender pathos.

SHUCK, HENRIETTA,

Was born in Kilmarnock, Virginia, on the 28th of October, 1817. She was the daughter of the Rev. Addison Hall, a Baptist clergyman of that place, and there her early years were spent. In 1831, Miss Hall was summoned from Fredericksburg, where she was at school, by her father to attend a camp-meeting which was held near her birth-place. She was converted on that occasion, and was baptized on the 2d day of September, 1831, when she was hardly fourteen; but her extreme youth did not prevent her from keeping faithfully the vows she so early took upon herself. On the 8th of September, 1835, Miss Hall was married to the Rev. J. Lewis Shuck, a missionary about to be sent by the Baptist church to China, for which country they embarked on the 22d of September. They reached Singapore in May, 1836, where their eldest son was born, and in the following September they arrived at Macao, where they remained till March, 1842, when they removed to Hong-kong. While at Macao, Mr. and Mrs. Shuck were allowed to prosecute the study of the Chinese language, the instruction of youth, and teaching the people. On their arrival at Hong-kong they renewed their labours on an enlarged scale, and without restraint. Mrs. Shuck interested herself principally in the schools. She possessed considerable knowledge of the written language, and still greater familiarity with the colloquial of the Chinese, and devoted joyfully and successfully her time and talents to the mission. During the last year of her life, a new school-house had been erected, and a school gathered under her care of twenty Chinese boys and six girls, besides her own four children. Her prospects of usefulness had never been greater than during this year. But in the midst of her highest hope, while children were seeking instruction and the heathen were enquiring the way to Christ, her life was suddenly cut short. She died on the 27th of November, 1847, soon after the birth of her fifth child.

Under a secret conviction that her end was near, she had "set her house in order," and was prepared for the event, while, at the same time, she prosecuted her daily duties with her usual cheerfulness, and laid out plans for labour which would have required a long life to perform. During Mrs. Shuck's eight years' residence in China she did much to help her husband in his work, besides giving direct instruction. Her aid and ready sympathy were always offered to the stranger or the afflicted, and she was constantly employed in acts of kindness and charity.

SMITH, MARGARET HARRISON,

LONG known as one of the earliest and most honoured of those educated women who went to Washington when it was made the seat of the American government, and gave, by their goodness, intelligence, and true refinement of feeling, that tone of Christian courtesy to the manners which is befitting the Metropolitan society of a Free Republic.

Mrs. Harrison Smith was a native of Pennsylvania, and born in 1778. Her father was Colonel John Bayard, who was in the public service during the revolutionary war, commanding a regiment of cavalry from Philadelphia. He was likewise Speaker of the Pennsylvania Legislature under the first Constitution of that State, when her Legislature consisted of but one body. It may be interesting to remark that as Speaker he signed the first legislative act ever passed in the United States for the abolition of slavery.

The associations of Colonel Bayard were chiefly with the leading whigs of that period, and his daughter thus early imbibed the ardent sentiments of American liberty which she retained during life. At the age of thirteen years we find her in New Brunswick in the family of Mr. Kirkpatrick, (afterwards Chief Justice of the State of New Jersey, who had married her elder sister.) In a short journal of that time, we learn that even at that age she had commenced writing poetry, her imagination having been warmed and excited by the beautiful scenery surrounding the Institution at Bethlehem, where she received her education, as also by the peculiar habits and duties of that Moravian Seminary. From the time of leaving school until the year 1800, she lived at intervals in Philadelphia, New Brunswick, and New York, in each place surrounded by a literary circle of acquaintances, devoting most of her time to reading and study. Aware then of the fervour of her imagination, she endeavoured to cool it by the perusal of works of a serious and useful kind; and thus while she cultivated that faculty, she strove to strengthen her mind, and make herself fit for the practical duties and virtues of life. She appears even then to have acquired a knowledge of her own character, and to have pursued her various studies actuated by a principle of duty; having entered thus early on the right path, we may say that this principle governed her conduct throughout life, and enabled her at all times to sacrifice self.

In the fall of 1800, she was married to Samuel Harrison Smith. This event, at all times a most important one to woman, was peculiarly so to her, for it was to separate her from her family and friends, and introduce her upon an entirely new stage of existence in the new Metropolis of the nation. Mr. Smith, upon the invitation of his friend Mr. Jefferson, then the Vice-President of the United States, and just about to become the President, had determined to establish the National Intelligencer at Washington, and immediately after his marriage he accordingly removed to that city. At this period Washington was literally a forest and swamp, with few or rather no conveniences or comforts; its houses mostly new and unfinished; Pennsylvania Avenue, now its crowded thoroughfare, a road dangerous for carriages to traverse. Mrs. Harrison Smith's letters tell of many a romantic wandering among its woods, and gathering of wild-wood flowers. From that day until her death in 1844, she resided in Washington or its immediate vicinity, mingling in all its varied society, and becoming personally acquainted with all the distinguished politicians of the country and foreign scientific visitors assembled there. Her taste for literature continued unabated, and indeed grew in strength, and she was at times led to compose and publish several tales and sketches.

Her first work she was induced to publish from motives of benevolence, devoting its proceeds (having no other means) to the assistance of a charitable institution in which she was deeply interested, and in the founding of which she had taken an active part. Indeed none of her writings was with a view to personal emolument, but to amuse and occupy the period which she spent in the retirement of the country, and in the hope that the moral inculcated by them might be of service to others, leading them to reflection and the purest virtue. Her first work, "A Winter in Washington, or the Seymour Family," in two volumes, was published in 1827. Her next, "What is Gentility?" appeared in 1830; and then she began contributing to the Journals. She wrote many classical tales (for she was versed in ancient as well as modern literature) and biographical sketches, in a spirited, agreeable vein, that was her natural style. Among these are "Presidential Inaugurations;" "The Cornelias;" "Roman Sketches;" "Aria;" "Deserted Child;" "William H. Crawford;" "Constantine;" and many others, published in the Lady's Book and Southern Literary Messenger. But her literary merit was of little consequence compared with her moral goodness, that beneficence of soul which always seemed ready to flow out on every side where her influance by word or deed could reach. In every portion of her life, Religion and its history was to her a subject of active interest and study; and this study had brought to her mind the perfect conviction of the truth of the Bible; and the ever and immediate presence of the great God, Creator, Protector, and Saviour, was to her a reality. In the days of her peace and calmness she could repose her head on His bosom; in the hours of distress and anguish humbly and meekly she threw herself at His feet, in the full confidence that whatever He ordered was right. Her whole life was a beautiful illustration of the power of the Christian religion to exalt the female character and give hope and happiness to the lot of woman.

T.

THURSTON, LAURA M.,

By birth Miss Hawley, was born in Norfolk, Connecticut, in 1812. Her early youth was passed in teaching. In 1839, she was married to Mr. Thurston, of New Albany, Indiana, at which place she had been engaged in her professional pursuits, and where she died in 1842. She wrote under the signature of "Viola," and her poems first appeared generally in the western papers. Ease, harmony, and sensibility, are the principal characteristic of her productions.

V.

VAN LENNEP, MARY ELIZABETH,

DAUGHTER of the Rev. Dr. Hawes, pastor of the Baptist church in Hartford, Connecticut, was born in that city, April 16th, 1821. The childhood and youth of Miss Hawes were spent principally in Hartford and New Haven, where her advantages were great. Her parents were qualified, mentally and morally, to give her suitable instruction, and favoured by God with pecuniary ability. In early youth she was distinguished for her love of truth, her gentleness, and her sympathizing disposition. While in her tenth year, Mary Hawes lost a younger brother, and soon after his death she became, in heart and life, a Christian. Her father waited long, and observed the young disciple narrowly, before he would permit her to make a public profession of her faith; but, satisfied by her consistent deportment, he at last welcomed her among his flock, and she never gave him cause to regret the step he had sanctioned. She became a zealous and active member of the church, and devoted herself especially to the Sunday School and the missionary cause.

On the 4th of September, 1843, Miss Hawes was married to the Rev. Henry J. Van Lennep, a missionary to Turkey, under the patronage of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. They sailed from Boston on the 11th of October of the same year, and arrived at Smyrna in December. In May, 1844, the mission family removed to Constantinople, where Mrs. Van Lennep commenced a school, numbering at first only five scholars, to which she devoted herself with her usual zeal and fidelity. Her career, which had promised to be one of much usefulness, was not permitted to be long. She was attacked by a painful disease early in August, of which she died on the 27th of September, 1844. Her body lies buried in the Protestant grave-yard near Constantinople.

VIRMEIRO, COUNTESS,

A NOBLE Portuguese lady, obtained, in 1771, a prize proposed by the Academy at Lisbon for the best tragedy; and the laurel-crown was awarded to her. The title of her tragedy was "Osmia." On opening the sealed envelope accompanying the manuscript, there was found only a direction, in case "Osmia" should prove successful, to devote the proceeds to the cultivation of olives, a fruit from which the Portuguese might derive much advantage. It was not till ten years afterwards that the name of the modest writer was known. She died in 1773

LONGEVITY.

THAT women live longer than men is conceded by all writers on the subject. This circumstance goes far to prove the more perfect organization of the female; because, in addition to her superior delicacy and complexity of structure, she has to develop and sustain the life of her offspring, which would exhaust her own, were she not endowed with a degree of vitality above that of the male. In machinery, made by human ingenuity, is not that which unites delicacy and complexity of workmanship with the greatest variety and durability of action accounted the most perfect? In 1830, it was found that, in the city of New York alone, out of 8009 persons upwards of seventy years of age, 4175 were women, to 3824 men!

MARY BENTON,

Is the oldest living female of whom we have received notice. She is an English-woman, residing at Gateshead—born February 12th, 1731, and is 120 years old. Her faculties are still useful.

C.

CHISHOLM, CAROLINE,

ONE of the most remarkable women of the age, is a native of Northamptonshire, England. Her maiden name was Jones; when about twenty years old, she was married to Captain Chisholm, of the Madras army, and two years afterwards went with her husband to India. Here she soon entered on that noble career of philanthropy which has given her a name and praise wherever the English language is known. Her first efforts were on behalf of poor, neglected children — “she established a School of Industry, for the instruction of the soldiers’ female children in reading, writing, needlework, cooking, and generally all domestic management. The girls were entirely removed from the contaminating influence of the barracks, and the success of the experiment was complete, the school still existing on the plan of the founder. In 1838, the Chisholms removed, for the benefit of Captain Chisholm’s health, to Australia, and here again, in the scenes she witnessed in the streets of Sydney — in the numbers of young girls wandering friendlessly about, and, of course, soon driven by mere want into the debauchery of what we believe was one of the most depraved towns in the world — the practical benevolence of Mrs. Chisholm was again roused. After combating unnumbered difficulties, she here succeeded in establishing an Emigrants’ Home, and ultimately an Agency-Office for the procurement of situations. She then estimated that there were 600 young women unprovided for in Sydney. Soon after the opening of the Home its founder received in it, from the ships in harbor, at one time, sixty-four girls, with a united capital of 14s. 1½d. Twenty-two had no money, several twopence, others fourpence. These girls she sent into the country. The majority are married, and not one lost her character.”

Mrs. Chisholm had strong faith in Providence, and believed that there must be a fitting place for everybody in the world. In this faith she labored; first, she helped women into situations in Australia, then she similarly helped men; next, she fell on the expedient of bringing wives and families to join husbands who longed for their society; and, lastly, she organized plans for sending out young women to the colony, with a view to balance the inequality of the sexes. To execute her designs in a proper manner, she required to know the real wants and condition of settlers; and she set out on long and painful journeys in a covered spring-van, and did not desist until she had gathered six hundred biographies!

“In 1845, Mrs. Chisholm was joined by her husband from India, and she prepared to return to England. Five years of earnest and successful endeavor had wonderfully altered the general opinion respecting her operations. There was no longer any fault-finding. Jealousies had been overcome. It was now the fashion to speak well of plans that were once viewed with apathy or suspicion. In Feb. 1846, a public meeting was held at Sydney, for the purpose of taking into consideration the presenting to Mrs. Chisholm, then on the eve of her departure for England, a testimonial of the estimation in which her labors on behalf of the emigrant population were viewed by the colonists. Some idea may be formed of the respect felt for the admirable lady, and acknowledgment of her public services, when eight members of the Legislative Council, the mayor of Sydney, the high-sheriff, thirteen magistrates, and many leading merchants, formed themselves into a committee to carry the wishes of the meeting into effect. The amount of each subscription was limited.” In a short time 150 guineas were raised, and presented with a laudatory address. “Mrs. Chisholm accepted the testimonial, in order to expend it in further promoting emigration, in restoring wives to husbands, and children to parents. In the course of her answer, she said: ‘It is my intention, if supported by your coöperation, to attempt more than I have hitherto performed.’ She left Australia, bearing with her the warm prayers of the working colonists, whose confidence and gratitude, both bond and free, she had thoroughly secured, charged with the self-imposed mission of representing in England the claims of those powerless classes who have neither honors nor pensions to bestow on their advocates."

In 1846 Mrs. Chisholm returned to England, and immediately began her work of doing good there. She formed the plan of sending out "Family Groups," twelve persons forming one family, each including several young women, who would thus have protection till they could be settled in homes of their own. She was the chief agent in organizing "The Family Colonization Loan Society," which is now patronized by the British Government. The highest dignitaries of the realm sought counsel of Mrs. Chisholm respecting the best manner of promoting emigration and securing the improvement of the people in that far-off colony. Her good sense, solid information and wise philanthropy gained the confidence of the powerful and the hearts of the poor. All trust, all honor her. The plans she has formed are now in active operation, and doing incalculable good. Caroline Chisholm has undoubtedly done more to advance the moral improvement of Australia than was ever done by any person or authority before her example, and she has immeasurably promoted human happiness. She began right, aided her own sex, and her greatest care and sympathy were given to women, whose well-being is the index of the progress of humanity. The "Memoirs of Mrs. Chisholm" is a book worth all the novels of the century in its teachings of the beauty of virtue, the triumph of goodness.

COLERIDGE, SARA,

DIED May 3d, 1852, aged forty-nine years. See page 629. She was the widow of Henry Coleridge, at her death, "The inheritrix of her father's genius and almost rival of his attainments," says an English writer; an American goes farther, saying she "may be described not only as a very gifted member of a gifted family, but in genius and acquirements one of the most remarkable women of our own or other times." Her talents were almost exclusively devoted to advancing and elucidating the writings and the fame of her father S. T. Coleridge.

F.

FLETCHER, MARY,

WIFE of the Rev. John Fletcher, and daughter of a highly respectable and wealthy family of the name of Bosanquet, was born September 1st, 1739, at Laytonstone in Essex, England. The religious impressions of her early years deepened as she grew up, and the young girl turned from the gay diversions and brilliant promises of high life in London, adopting a simplicity of dress at variance with the fashions of the times, and preferring to all other society that of the people of God. Annoyed by these singularities, her parents on her refusal to give a promise not to attempt to persuade her younger brothers to become Christians in her sense of the word, intimated to her that she had better seek a home elsewhere. She did so. She left her father's house with its luxurious elegance, its well-furnished rooms and its fine gardens, and in humble lodgings, attended only by her maid, she ate her simple, solitary meal with gladness and singleness of heart.

She soon invited Mrs. Ryan, a beloved and deeply pious friend, to share her home, her purse and her heart, and removed to a house of her own in Laytonstone. There emulating the example of the deaconesses in the primitive church, who "lodged strangers, brought up children, relieved the afflicted, and diligently followed after every good work," she established an Orphan House. It grew up as silently as a way-faring tree, with its grateful shade for the wearied traveller. There was none of the friction and jar of machinery — no effort to enlist the sympathies and co-operation of others. An earnest, prayerful Christian woman, the great aim of whose life was to love God with all her heart and her neighbor as herself, opened her doors to those who had no one to care for them, and added serious women to her household to assist her in the performance of its varied duties. Orphans were taken in, and trained to habits of early rising, labor, and self-denial, that they might be fitted for domestic service, or be put out to trades — one governess was employed to instruct them — infirm and helpless women were received, and kindly ministered to — the religious meetings held in the house, several evenings in the week, were attended by many from the neighborhood, and Miss Bosanquet was soon at the head of a family of thirty persons dependent upon her for their support, and her house had become a centre of religious influence. Mr. Wesley, in his journal, gives it this emphatic commendation — "On Thursday, February 12th, 1767, I preached at Laytonstone. O, what a house of God is here! Not only for decency and order, but for the life and power of religion. I am afraid there are very few such to be found in all the king's dominions."

Five years were spent in Laytonstone, and here she had the mournful privilege of ministering to the declining years of her parents, and smoothing their dying pillow. Her house, however, was small, and there was no land attached to it; and, with the advice of her friends, she removed to Yorkshire, where she purchased a farm. The direction of this added greatly to her cares, and the death of her friend Mrs. Ryan threw the whole management and responsibility of the household upon her. Children to be governed — the sick taken care of — every member of the household to be separately conversed with — the direction of the public meetings of the society — the laying in of the stores — the care of the kitchen — the management of the needlework — truly, she must have been diligent in business and fervent in spirit to meet these manifold demands.

For fourteen years, after her removal to Yorkshire, did Miss Bosanquet provide out of her own income for the wants of her large family: thirty-four children, and thirty-five persons, were members of her household, though not all at one time. But for some years her path had been beset with difficulties — the person to whom she had entrusted the charge of the farm had become deeply involved, and her own affairs were so much embarrassed, that the only course left for her to pursue seemed to be, to sell her farm, and disperse her household. Several advantageous offers of marriage were made by gentlemen whose sincere attachment wished to shield her from perplexity. They were declined. But one image had ever entered the “study of her imagination.” But one idea had ever shaken her determination to lead a single life, and that was that, if she were “to marry Mr. Fletcher, he would be a help, and not a hindrance, to her.” Twenty-five years had passed since she first met him in London, (where he was Mr. Wesley’s assistant,) but they had not effaced the impressions then made on these kindred hearts. Deterred from addressing her at that time by her large fortune, Mr. Fletcher had not seen her for fifteen years, and now, in this dark hour of her outward difficulty, he wrote to her, avowing a regard which time had not weakened. He had just returned from the Continent, where he had been prostrated by alarming illness; and soon after his arrival at Cross Hall in Yorkshire, his union with one who had long occupied a place in his affections was determined upon. A week before their marriage, her farm and stock were most advantageously sold — places were obtained for the scattered members of her family; and, after the settlement of her affairs, she was enabled to give fifty-five pounds a year to the pious women of her dispersed household, and still retain an income equal to Mr. Fletcher’s.

That quiet parsonage in Madeley — that home of Christian peace and love — those days of holy activity and blessed communion with one of the most saint-like beings that ever dwelt on earth! — it must have been a haven of rest, after the troubled waters of Cross Hall; and her heart overflowed with gratitude for the loving-kindness of her heavenly Father, which had provided for her such a refuge from the storm. All her sorrows were forgotten — her cup ran over with joy, and in the faithful performance of the duties devolving upon the wife of the vicar of the populous parish of Madeley, her sphere of action was greatly enlarged. The time was short. Three years of perfect conjugal happiness passed quickly away, and then the earthly arm upon which she had leaned so trustingly was withdrawn, and she was once more to tread her appointed path of duty alone.

For thirty years of “solemn, awful widowhood,” Mrs. Fletcher kept, as days of prayerful remembrance, the anniversaries of her husband’s birthday (the same with her own, though he was ten years the elder), her marriage-day, and the day of her husband’s death. Her journal has many records like the following, breathing an affection over which time had no power:

“November 12th, 1809. Twenty-eight years this day, and at this hour, I gave my hand and heart to John William de la Flechere. A profitable and blessed period of my life. I feel at this moment a more tender affection toward him than I did at that time, and by faith I now join my hand afresh with his.”

Mrs. Fletcher’s widowed home was still in the parsonage, kindly offered to her by her husband’s successor, who did not reside at Madeley, and who knowing the deep interest she felt in the people, allowed her to nominate the curate. To her great comfort, the same spirit that animated her husband pervaded the ministrations of those who succeeded him in his labors, and much harmony existed among the parishioners, most of whom, as well as Mrs. Fletcher, were members of the Methodist society, whilst in communion with the Church of England. The long period of her widowhood was by no means the least useful part of her life. She did not, in her sorrow, withdraw herself from active labors in her Master’s service — her “house was an inn for the Lord’s people” — many visited her for spiritual advice and conversation — an extensive religious correspondence was carried on — numbers resorted to her stated religious meetings, — and the poor and sick of the parish were visited in their affliction. While her expenditure for her own apparel never exceeded twenty dollars a year, her gifts to the poor amounted to nearly a thousand dollars annually — thus expending upon herself one-fortieth part of what she gave to her neighbor. One who knew her well, declared that “she never heard of a case of distress without relieving it, if in her power — that this world’s wealth was no more to her than the dust of the balance.” The first part of the divine command to “love God with all the heart, and with all the soul and with all the mind,” she obeyed by the entire dedication of her life to His service, and He honored her devotion by bringing many to the knowledge of the truth through her instrumentality. One of them was the nephew, godson, and namesake of her husband, the only one of his relations whom she ever saw. This young man left his home in Switzerland, and came to England to visit her. He was amiable and attractive, intelligent and moral, but he was a Deist, and did not believe the Scriptures. Through the prayers and earnest conversations of his aunt, he was led to embrace Christianity in deed and in truth.

Two years before Mrs. Fletcher's death, her youngest brother William died, and she was left the last of her family, having lost a short time before her other brother and an only sister, whose views were congenial with her own, but whose married home removed her to a distance. Her brother William's valuable gifts to her, at different times, had enabled her to continue her charities on their liberal scale, and his visits to her after her husband's death and in her latter years, were very comforting to her. And now her life of prayer and faith and usefulness was drawing to a close. Her seventy-sixth year found her still working while it was day, giving the fruits of her mature experience to the younger disciples, who came to her house, at stated times, to listen to the last teachings of the aged pilgrim. "Thou shalt walk with me in white" was the great promise of her life, that beamed brightly before her youthful vision, and gladdened the eyes growing dim with age; and on the morning of the 9th of December, 1815, she quietly fell asleep in Jesus.

FULHAME, MRS.

AN Englishwoman, who has made experiments by a chemical process to mix gold, silver, platina, lead, arsenic, and other metals, with the texture of silks, in a manner to change these into real gold and silver ore stuffs. She wrote an "Essay on Combustion," with the view of a new art of dyeing and painting, wherein the philogistic and antiphlogistic hypotheses are proved erroneous. As yet, her ideas have not been realized in the manufactories of England; from which, however, the inference is not to be drawn, that in future an improvement could not be made to give rise to a new branch of industry and luxury founded on her invention.

H.

HAUTPHOES, BARONESS,

Is an English lady of noble family. Her two novels, "The Initials" and "Cyrilla," place her in the first class of contemporary novelists. Living in Germany, she has made that country the scene of her stories; but the truth of her delineations of human nature may be recognised wherever there are men and women. In the heroes and heroines there may be some exaggeration; but that is allowable, as in heroic pictures the principal figures are usually made larger than life, that they may predominate in the foreground. We are quite willing to grant the creator of such an engaging character as Crescentz or Cyrilla a little margin to bring out her plot; the slight inaccuracies that may be perceived through the microscope of criticism are fully atoned for by counterbalancing excellencies. The author has deservedly won her laurels.

L.

LYON, MARY,

ONE of the most remarkable women that New England has produced, was born in Buckland, Massachusetts, February 28, 1797. Her ancestors on both sides seem to have been for many generations intelligent and devoted Christians. This will account in a great measure for the uniform and consistent tenor of her life and character. Like those stones quarried and hewn by patient labor in the far-off hills of Lebanon, but whose purpose was unrecognised until they lay in their fair perfection on the side of Mount Moriah, fit and ready for the glorious temple rising in silent majesty, so did Mary Lyon come to the work before her. The severe internal conflicts of an undisciplined heart and temper seem to have been almost unknown to her. Those battles had been fought and gained by the ones who had gone before. She was left free to bring to the great object suggested by her heart and conscience as her proper task in life, the powers and the fresh energies of a clear and comprehensive mind, a strong will, and lively affections.

Her early education was obtained partly at home and partly from the district schools. She commenced her career as a teacher near Shelburne Falls, Massachusetts, receiving as compensation, seventy-five cents a week and her board. With the slender means she could collect by spinning, weaving, teaching, &c., she entered, in 1817, the Academy at Ashfield. When these were expended, she was about to return to her old employment, when the trustees of the academy gave her the free use of all its advantages. Of these she availed herself with the most untiring industry. It was judged by the family where she boarded, that she slept but four hours in the twenty-four. That she could "toil so terribly" is but another proof of the uncommon vigor of her mind and body. It took her but three days to learn and recite, with unusual accuracy, all those parts of Adams's Latin Grammar usually committed to memory.

Her services as a teacher began to be eagerly sought; and when, in this way, she had obtained sufficient means to justify it, she would seek out some school where she could receive instruction on particular subjects, in which she found herself deficient. With the avails of her labor and the remnant of her patrimony, she went, in 1821, to attend the Rev. Joseph Emerson's school in Byfield. Years afterwards, Mr. Emerson remarked, that in mental power he considered Miss Lyon superior to any other pupil he had ever had in his seminary. To him she always expressed the greatest obligations, as the first teacher who had directed her mind to its proper objects. She had been from her childhood religiously inclined, but, under his instructions, she for the first time took a decided stand on that important point; and her course ever after was like that of the just, shining "more and more unto the perfect day."

In 1822, Miss Lyon taught in the Academy at Ashfield. In 1824, she joined Miss Grant in the Adams's Female Academy, at Londonderry, New Hampshire. Here they had a large school, managed on that system so successfully carried out in Ipswich and South Hadley. This could not be opened during the winter, and Miss Lyon, never at ease unless employed about the work given her to do, opened a winter-school, during her leisure months, sometimes at Buckland, and at other seasons at Ashfield. In these she was remarkably successful, and, by bringing her closely in contact with the young girls of her native hills, struggling, as she had done, for an education, these winter-schools prepared her to devise the plan so well carried out at South Hadley.

In 1828, Miss Grant removed to Ipswich, and Miss Lyon's coöperation being needed there throughout the year, she gave up, with much reluctance, her own schools. Neither were her patrons more willing to lose her. They made great exertions to retain her, and, failing this, endeavored in vain to induce Miss Grant to remove her seminary to that part of the State. It was the religious character of the Buckland school, more than anything else, that drew the hearts of the people towards it; but, while making education but the handmaiden to piety, Miss Lyon taught all that she had to teach with so much earnestness and accuracy, that there were but few of her pupils who did not do her and themselves credit. The school that numbered twenty-five at its commencement closed with one hundred scholars.

At Ipswich her success was equally great. Over two hundred pupils were sometimes collected under the care of Miss Grant and Miss Lyon; and their influence over them, powerful and transforming as it was, was always on the side of the highest moral and intellectual elevation of character.

Miss Lyon remained here for six years, during the latter part of which time she was slowly maturing in her mind the plan, the object of which can be best explained by the following extracts from a letter from her to the one to whom she always acknowledged the highest obligations, and to whom she ever showed the strongest love and confidence:—

“Ipswich, May 12, 1834.

“MY VERY DEAR MOTHER—

“I do not expect to continue my connection with Miss Grant after this summer. I have for a great while been thinking about those young ladies who find it necessary to make such an effort for their education as I made, when I was obtaining mine. In one respect, from year to year, I have not felt quite satisfied with my present field of labor. I have desired to be in a school, the expenses of which would be so small, that many who are now discouraged from endeavoring to enjoy the privileges of this, might be favored with those which are similar at less expense.

“The course of instruction adopted in this institution, and the course which I have endeavored to adopt when I have instructed among my native hills, I believe is eminently suited to make good mothers as well as teachers. I have had the pleasure of seeing many, who have enjoyed these privileges, occupying the place of mothers. I have noticed with peculiar interest the cultivated and good common sense, the correct reasoning, the industry and perseverance, the patience, meekness, and gentleness, of many of them. I have felt, that if all our common farmers, men of plain, good common sense, could go through the country, and witness these mothers in their own families, they would no longer consider the money expended on them as thrown away.

— “Oh, how immensely important is this work of preparing the daughters of the land to be good mothers! If they are prepared for this situation, they will have the most important preparation which they can have for any other: they can soon and easily become good teachers, and they will become, at all events, good members of society.”

During this year Miss Lynn commenced her active exertions in carrying out the purpose which had been so slowly maturing in her own mind. She wrote letters, she made collections, she went about explaining here and there, to influential men or committees, her wishes and her expectations. She held up before the people the object dear to her heart—the bringing a liberal education within the means of all young women who should heartily desire it,—until it became to them as important as to her. With consummate wisdom and tact, she avoided throughout these energetic measures bringing herself into any position of unenviable notoriety, or by indiscreet zeal injuring her own purposes. The obstacles she had to encounter were not those of active opposition or dislike, but perhaps the ones more difficult to contend with, of utter indifference and apathy. A few far-seeing men and women appreciated her views, and heartily coöperated with her. Her patience and untiring energy did the rest.

By the autumn of 1837 the building erected at South Hadley, Massachusetts, by Miss Lyon's exertions, and named the “Mount Holyoke Female Seminary,” was open to receive pupils. It was so enlarged afterwards as to accommodate two hundred and twenty young ladies. To use Miss Lyon's own words, ‘Its grand object is to furnish the greatest possible number of female teachers, of high literary qualifications, and of benevolent, self-denying zeal.’ It is intended only for the older class of young ladies. It has no similarity with the “Manual Labor Schools,” with which it has often been confounded. The domestic work is all performed by the members of the school, but that occupies not more than an hour a-day. The rest of their time can be devoted to their literary pursuits. The idea of making the labor of students profitable, was rejected at once by the clear practical judgment of Miss Lyon.

For eleven years she watched over this school with a love and patience that never flagged. During this time more than two thousand young ladies went forth from her forming hands to enter upon their own conflict with the world; and of many of them it may truly be said, ‘her own works praise her in the gates.’

There was no mercenary alloy in Miss Lyons' exertions. She gave all that she possessed,—her time, her intellect, her energy, and her love, and asked as her pecuniary recompense, but a home in the Seminary, and two hundred dollars a year.

There is not room here to speak of her virtues as a daughter, sister, and friend. In all these relations she acted as might be expected from one whose affections were so strong, and whose ideas of duty so high. Neither can we give but a faint idea of her Christian character, nor of her peculiar influence over her pupils. With her strong, clear, penetrating mind, controlled always by the highest and purest motives, she possessed also the power given to but few, of infusing into those around her, her own aims and her own feelings.

Having finished her course, Miss Lyon was taken to her reward. She died of an epidemic at South Hadley, March 5, 1849. On one side of her monument is a sentence she uttered in the last instruction she gave to her school a few days before her death, in reference to the prevailing sickness.

"There is nothing in the universe that I fear but that I shall not know all my duty, or shall fail to do it."

M.

MCCORD, LOUISAS.

DAUGHTER of Hon. Langdon Cheves, of South Carolina, and wife of D. J. McCord, an eminent lawyer of that State, has distinguished herself in what may be styled political literature, a species of writing seldom attempted by woman. Miss Cheves was carefully and liberally educated, partly in Philadelphia. She was, in early youth, remarked for her abilities and her earnest efforts after excellence. The warm enthusiasm of her nature was intensified by her Southern patriotism, and these feelings have caused her to enter earnestly into questions of State policy, and lend her ready pen to uphold what to her seem the most important truths. She has published, chiefly, in the Southern Quarterly Review and Literary Messenger, but a few of her best articles appeared in De Bow's Review—among these "Woman and her Needs" is exceedingly well written. Indeed, we think her Essays will be found, upon fair comparison, equal to any that form the higher articles in the very best Reviews. She reasons well; her style is excellent, and flashes of wit, "temperately bright" as a woman's should be, please without wounding. Her "Letter to the Duchess of Sutherland" was published in the Charleston Mercury, 1853, and deservedly admired for its dignified tone. Among her articles in the Southern Quarterly may be named "The Right to Labor," "Justice and Fraternity," "Enfranchisement of Woman," and "Uncle Tom's Cabin," as papers of great power. "Woman's Progress" is another of her sterling articles.

Mrs. McCord has written some beautiful poems—one volume, "My Dreams," was published in 1848, and a tragedy, "Caius Gracchus," in 1851

MAXWELL, LADY,

A WOMAN who attained high preëminence in the religious world by her holiness of life and character, and her active benevolence, was born about the year 1742, in the parish of Largs, county of Ayr, in Scotland. She was the daughter of Thomas Brisbane, Esq. There was nothing in Miss Darcy Brisbane's childhood indicative of her future devoted piety, although, even at an early age, she was distinguished by a humane and charitable disposition. She was educated in a manner becoming her position; and, after spending a winter in London with her aunt, the Marchioness of Louthian, she married, at the age of seventeen, Sir Walter Maxwell, Bart., of Pollock. The happiness she had promised herself in this union was soon blighted. In a little more than two years her husband was removed by death, and in six weeks after she was deprived of her son and only child. Thus she was left, at nineteen, a widow and childless. Her affliction was great, and for a time overwhelming. She was never known to mention either her husband or child after their death. In a letter written to an intimate friend, more than fifteen years after these sad events, she remarks—

"You ask me to give you the particulars of my awakening and conversion; and how, since, the work of sanctification has been carried on. To give you a minute detail of this, would carry one beyond the limits of a letter, and lead me to do violence to my temper and feelings: the former by nature shy, and in this respect not entirely conquered by grace; the latter keen and tender, easily wounded by recalling past scenes of woe, when indeed they were tried to the uttermost. Suffice it to say, I was chosen in the furnace of affliction. The Lord gave me all I desired in this world, then took all from me; but immediately afterward sweetly drew me to Himself."

It was while Lady Maxwell was in this deep affliction, that she became acquainted with that part of the church of Christ with which she was afterward associated. The ministry of the Rev. John Wesley and the Rev. George Whitefield was at that time highly approved in Scotland; and they numbered among their audiences not only the respectable and the wealthy, but also the high-born. Lady Maxwell was induced to attend the Wesleyan chapel; and in 1764 her personal acquaintance with Mr. John Wesley commenced. This soon ripened into a friendship which continued firm and unabated until Mr. Wesley's death, and doubtless influenced Lady Maxwell through her whole life. They corresponded constantly; and, even in his advice and exhortations, Wesley shows the exalted estimate he had formed of the young widow.

In 1764, she renewed a covenant with God which she had made just after her great affliction, and soon after decided to join herself openly with that body of Christians in connection with Rev. John Wesley. Not that she disapproved of the Established Church of Scotland, in which she had been educated, or thought that true piety was not to be found under a variety of forms — for her spirit was preëminently catholic, — but, after mature deliberation, she decided that among the Methodists she would find that state of religion best suited to her own wants. In taking this step she continued to afford without partiality, as far as it was in her power, her aid for the furtherance of true religion in every department of the church of Christ.

From the time Lady Maxwell became a widow, she resided in Edinburgh or its vicinity. Ever after her conversion to God, she sought retirement from the gayeties of the world. She had her daily walks of benevolence. In name and character, she became well known to a large circle of religious friends. Her influence was great, and her usefulness extensive; but it was silent and unobtrusive. Easy in her circumstances, and surrounded by her friends, her life from this time to its close is marked by no striking incident. It was spent in the blessedness of being, receiving, and doing good.

Strikingly beautiful, with a person at once graceful, dignified, and commanding, with a mind superior both in its kind and culture, she had, in the early part of her Christian course, to hold a constant conflict with the world. She was also frequently solicited to enter again the marriage state, and might have formed an alliance with the first families of the empire; but she never, except with regard to one offer, and that for a short season, entertained a thought of the kind. She devoted herself wholly to the service of God, and in promoting the welfare of those around her she found all that was necessary to give her heart and mind full employment.

Many of her early associates withdrew from her when she became a Methodist. But this Lady Maxwell never deplored, and perhaps did not feel. Among her friends she numbered Lady Henrietta Hope, and Lady Glenorchy, a woman who, in her trials as well as in her religious experience, had so many points of similarity with Lady Maxwell, that there could not but be a great sympathy between them, although they differed widely in many of their religious opinions. Lady Glenorchy died in 1786, leaving a large part of her fortune to be devoted to religious and charitable purposes. By her will she appointed Lady Maxwell her sole executrix and the principal manager of her chapels, both in England and Scotland. This appointment brought with it great responsibility and much solicitude; but it also led her into an extensive field of usefulness. She steadfastly believed that she had been called by God to this work, and carried into effect, with scrupulous conscientiousness, every title of Lady Glenorchy's will. She took several journeys to Bristol in order to superintend the building a chapel there, which had been projected by the Ladies Hope and Glenorchy. This Lady Maxwell named "Hope Chapel," after her dear friend; and finding, after a trial, that the purpose of the pious founders, to provide a place of worship for the gay visitors at that then fashionable watering place, would be better accomplished by allowing an Episcopal minister to officiate, she, with her usual liberality, relinquished her own prepossessions in favor of the dissenting form.

No outward work seemed to her so important as that of saving souls. To do her part in this was one of her most earnest desires. For the purpose of affording education and Christian instruction to poor children, Lady Maxwell established, July 2d, 1770, a school in Edinburgh. Over this she kept a constant and careful supervision, and had the satisfaction of knowing that it accomplished much good. At the time of her death, about eight hundred children, boys and girls, had been taught every branch of education proper for their line of life, and every possible attempt used to induce them to take a living interest in eternal things. This charity is still in active operation; her ladyship having made provision for its existence, so long as time shall last.

With Lady Maxwell, benevolence continued to expand in proportion to her piety; her faith and works ever walked hand in hand. She was among the first and most zealous patrons of Sabbath schools in Scotland. In 1787, while burdened with the heavy charge left to her by Lady Glenorchy's will, she established several Sabbath schools in Edinburgh, under her own patronage. This was a new work at the time, Robert Raikes having announced the noble undertaking but a few years before in England, and she had to struggle against the prejudices, distrust, and indifference with which innovations of any kind, especially those of a religious nature, are always regarded. But faith, and the perseverance that is its fruit, enabled Lady Maxwell to triumph over all opposition, and now, nowhere is there a warmer interest felt in such labors, than in Scotland.

She died at her residence, in Edinburgh, on the second of July, 1810, at the age of sixty-eight, while still in the possession of all her powers, both of mind and body, and before she had the pain of feeling that she had outlived her usefulness. Her last moments were filled, as she herself said, with a "peace inexpressibly sweet." All ranks and classes in Edinburgh mourned for the loss of one of such exalted piety and great usefulness. There was scarcely a humane institution in the country, or a public or private charity, whether for the repose of age, or the instruction of youth, the relief of indigence, or the help of sickness; for the reformation of morals, or the support of religion, to which she had not been a benefactor. For although her income was not large, by avoiding every useless expense, she was able to give more than many who possessed ten times her means. And it has been recorded of her, that there was no sum which she gave, however small, whether to an institution or an individual, but was followed by an earnest prayer, that what she had done might receive the blessing of God.

MULOCK, MISS.

A YOUNG Irish authoress of great promise. She has already given to the world several novels that have obtained decided success. The best of these is "Olive," a very charming work. It develops woman's true advantage, her spiritual superiority—and shows how that quality, fostering all woman's virtues, can overcome the world's greatest temptations:—that the world's best gifts, beauty, wealth, rank, are mean and pitiful without the soul's real dignity.

"The Head of the Family," another of her novels, has been greatly praised, but we think it decidedly inferior to "Olive" in its sustained power and truthfulness of delineation. "Agatha's Husband," and "The Ogilvies," are respectable productions, but Miss Mulock's genius gains no lustre from these. Still the author of "Olive" holds a warm place in the heart of young lady novel-readers, and she has an opportunity of holding a very high rank among popular writers.

P.

PACKER, HARRIET L.,

WIDOW of the late William S. Packer, of Brooklyn, N. Y., has done a noble deed, well entitling her to a place in the Records of distinguished Women. She has given the sum of sixty-five thousand dollars for the endowment of a Female Academy, to be located at Brooklyn. Mr. Packer, her husband, had thought of endowing such an institution, but he died without fulfilling his intention; his widow has carried out the munificent idea, which will make their name to be ever remembered.

PHELPS, ELIZABETH STUART,

DAUGHTER of the late eminent Professor Moses Stuart, of Andover, Mass., displayed in her girlhood unmistakable promise of fine abilities. She was carefully educated, and had the blessed lot to marry a man of rare talent and fervent piety, the Rev. Austin Phelps, who loved and cherished the genius of his gentle, lovely wife. She had, however, hardly begun her literary career, before she was called to a higher life: she died, in Boston, November 20th, 1852. Her three works, "Sunny Side," "A Peep at No. Five," and "The Angel over the Right Shoulder," have beautifully portrayed departments of religious duty, not often thought of, and thus awakened many slumbering minds. "Sunny Side" is the most remarkable for its dramatic power; but all are distinguished by rare delicacy of thought, which clothes the humblest condition in beauty and glory when the inner life is pure and holy. The influence of rightly-guided genius is inestimable, and Mrs. Phelps had genius of the highest order in its aspirations.

PUTNAM, MARY LOWELL,

WIFE of SAMUEL R. PUTNAM, Esq., of Boston, Mass., is acknowledged to be the most accomplished lady linguist now living; few men excel her in the knowledge of the modern European languages. She belongs to a distinguished family, daughter of the Rev. Charles Lowell, D. D., sister of James R. Lowell, the Poet; and her mother, the late Mrs. Lowell, possessed extraordinary genius, which she devoted to the training and education of her children. To the example of this excellent mother, Mrs. Putnam is doubtless indebted for the persevering zeal which has kept up and on her own course of intellectual improvement since her marriage. Her extraordinary knowledge of the languages is only one of her many accomplishments. In History she is equally well versed, as was lately shown in her articles on the "Hungarian Question," published in the Christian Examiner, where she exposed the errors and overthrew the arguments of Mr. Bowen, then Editor of the N. A. R., who had attempted to disparage Kossuth, and the cause of freedom in Hungary. Mrs. Putnam felt obliged to reply, for the sake of truth and justice; her papers were effectual, and her name deserves honour from all who love genius devoted to truth and justice.

RUMFORD, COUNTESS OF,

DAUGHTER of Benjamin Thompson, Count Rumford, of Concord, N. H. Died in that town, Dec. 2d, 1852, aged seventy years; leaving the bulk of her property to aid charities for women.

WELBY, AMELIA B.,

DIED at Lexington, Ky., May 2d, 1852. See page 811.

WESLEY, SUSANNAH,

MOTHER of the celebrated founder of Methodism, was the youngest daughter and favorite child of Dr. Samuel Annesley, a distinguished nonconformist divine of England, who was, at the period of her birth, 1669 or 1670, residing in London. He belonged to a good family, and possessed an independent fortune, so that his children were deprived of no advantages to be derived from society or careful culture. Susannah Annesley was endowed by nature with a sound and vigorous understanding, which, under such favorable circumstances, developed itself at a very early age. Under the parental roof, and before she was thirteen, she examined without restraint from her father, a man too liberal and enlightened to be a bigot, the controversy between the Established Church and the Dissenters. The result of this investigation was, that she renounced her religious fellowship with the latter, and adopted the creed and forms of the Church of England; to which she adhered as long as she lived.

About the year 1689, she became the wife of Mr. Samuel Wesley, a clergyman of the Established Church in England, but who, like herself, had been brought up among the Dissenters. He was at that time a curate in London, with a yearly salary of thirty pounds, which sum he increased by his writings to sixty. They lived in lodgings in London for about a year, when they removed to South Ormsby, in Lincoln county, where Mr. Wesley had been appointed to a living worth about fifty pounds. Here they remained until about the end of 1696, when Mr. Wesley, by his boldness in reproving vice, having fallen under the displeasure of the nobleman who had obtained the living for him, was obliged to resign; and soon after, with his family, consisting, by that time, of a wife and five or six children, he removed to Epworth, where he had obtained a rectory valued at somewhat less than three hundred pounds a year; here he remained until his death, in 1735.

Their pecuniary circumstances have been so carefully detailed, that the reader may know with what difficulties Mrs. Wesley had to contend from the earliest part of her married life. Her husband, though a devoted Christian, and a man of great integrity of character, was too much absorbed in literary matters, and in the religious and polemical questions of the day, to attend carefully to his own affairs. All matters connected with the household economy or the training of the children fell to Mrs. Wesley's lot; and the heart of her husband seems to have trusted in her with a feeling of entire confidence and safety, which the result proves to have been fully deserved.

At the time of her marriage she was young, beautiful, and accomplished, with a loveliness of face and figure which remained even in her old age. She gave no thought to making a figure with these advantages, or to her own pleasure or comfort. She devoted all the faculties of a nature strong in every way, in its conscientiousness, its mental powers, and its affections, to the duties she had taken upon herself. Of the nineteen children that were born to them, ten lived to grow up, and to bear witness, by their fervor of religious zeal and their uncommon mental powers, to their careful training.

From Mr. Wesley's narrow circumstances, the education of their children fell especially upon Mrs. Wesley, who seems to have possessed every qualification requisite for a public or private teacher. Her powers of systematizing and arrangement were especially remarkable, and from her, her son John Wesley evidently derived the peculiar gift, which enabled him to form, out of the discordant and undisciplined masses that yielded to the power of his eloquence, and to the blessed influence which followed it, a body so compact and efficient, that it has derived its name from its regular organization. This same son mentions with admiration, "the calm serenity with which his mother transacted business, wrote letters, and conversed, surrounded by her thirteen children." All these were educated by herself. And as she was a woman who lived by rule, she methodized everything so exactly, that to each operation she had a time, and time sufficient to transact all the business of the family. It appears also, that she had no small share in managing the secular concerns of the rectory. The tithes and glebe were much under her inspection.

Mrs. Wesley had many trials in her married life apart from the loss of several children. About 1701, Mr. Wesley observed that his wife did not say amen, when, during family prayer, he uttered the petition for the king. He asked the reason of her silence. 'Because,' said she, 'I do not believe the prince of Orange to be king.' 'If that be the case,' said he, 'we must part; for if we have two kings, we must have two houses.' Mrs. Wesley, conscientious in every thing, was inflexible. Her husband went immediately to London, where, being convocation man for the diocese of Lincoln, he remained for the rest of the year. In 1702, King William died; and as Mrs. Wesley agreed with her husband as to the legitimacy of Queen Anne's title, the cause of the misunderstanding ceased, and Mr. Wesley returned to Epworth.

The parsonage house was twice burnt. The last conflagration occurred in 1709, when the building, and almost all it contained, was entirely destroyed; and until it could be rebuilt, the family were scattered among neighbors, relatives, and friends. This separation was a great grief to Mrs. Wesley, who did all in her power to correct the injurious effects of it upon her children, by full and constant correspondence with them.

Mr. Wesley sometimes attended the sittings of the convocation, and on these occasions was obliged to reside for a length of time in London. In 1711 or 1712, he spent some months in that city on this business, and the care of the parish devolved on a curate, who was but indifferently qualified for the charge. During her husband's absence, Mrs. Wesley felt it her duty to pay more attention to her children, especially on the Sabbath, as there was then no service in the afternoon at church.

She read prayers and a sermon to them, and conversed with them on religious subjects. The neighbors asked permission to join in these services, which was granted them. A good report of the meeting became general, and at last more than two hundred attended; the house was so full that many were obliged to go away for want of room. This led John Wesley to remark, 'that his mother, as well as her father, grandfather, husband, and her three sons, had been in her measure a preacher of righteousness.'

As she wished to do nothing without her husband's knowledge, she acquainted him with their meeting. While he approved her zeal and good sense, he stated several objections to which it was liable. What these were may be seen from her answer, dated Epworth, February 6th, 1712. We have not room for this admirable letter, and a synopsis would not do it justice. Suffice it to say, that her husband felt its power and wisdom, and cordially gave her his approbation; she went on her way rejoicing, and great good was done, more probably, by this irregular ministry, through the grace of God, than had been effected by that of the rector and his curates for the preceding eighteen years.

It is worthy of remark, that Mrs. Wesley, in her letter, terms the people that composed these meetings, our SOCIETY; and the meetings were conducted much after the manner of those of the Methodists' Society now. This is not the first instance in which the seeds of that great work, since called Methodism, were sown in and by the original members of this remarkable family.

Mrs. Wesley lived long enough to see her maternal labors and love rewarded by the celebrity and usefulness of her two most eminent sons, to know that her ardent aspirations for personal holiness and devotion were shared and strengthened by them, and to have her declining years soothed by the warm affection and care of all her living children. She survived her husband about seven years, and died at the house of her son John, in London, on the 23d of July, 1742. Her last words to those who stood around her dying bed were, 'Children, as soon as I am released, sing a Psalm of praise to God.'

Although the fame of John and Charles Wesley has overshadowed the merits of the other members of the family, yet many of them were persons of unusual mental and moral endowments. In a work on distinguished women Samuel Wesley, Jr., can have no place, but Emily Wesley, afterwards Mrs. Harper, and Mehetabel Wesley, afterwards Mrs. Wright, were both women worthy of record.

WETHERELL, OR WARNER, ELIZABETH,

Has written several popular works. Her first was the "Wide, Wide World," published in 1851. Since then, she has sent out "Queechy," "Ellen Montgomery's Book-shelf," and "The Law and the Testimony," a collection of texts from the Bible, which shows a profound reverence for and love of the doctrines of Holy Writ. The work will be of use to Biblical students.

But Miss Wetherell has made her name a household word, by her fresh romances of real life. The stories are interesting, the scope of her works excellent, inasmuch as she inculcates the highest motives of action. She teaches, with all good people, that "this world is all a fleeting show;" that happiness must be grounded on higher and holier views than fallen humanity can reach; in short, she makes the Bible a text-book for her characters. Her child heroines are very loveable, and the influence of their example will, we trust, be salutary. Miss Wetherell has undoubted claim to the honour of originating a new style of novel, and already has a number of imitators

WRIGHT, FANNY, died at Cincinnati, Dec. 2d, 1852. (See page 842.)

We give here the record of two noble English women recently gone from this world.

SALE, LADY, died at Cape Town, July 6th, 1853. (See page 849.)

SOUTHEY, MRS., died in England, July 20th, 1854. (See page 702.)

SUMMARY.

SINCE the Fourth Era of this book was prepared, 1851, changes have occurred among the living writers then included. Some of these changes are noticed under the names in that Era, others in the New Supplement; here we have small space for the closing remarks.

The Coup d'Etat struck down Genius as well as Liberty in France; when men dare not write, women must besilent. This dulness pervades the continent; scarcely a new work of any note from woman's pen has appeared in France, Germany or Italy, for the last three years. Sweden has done better: Miss Bremer's "Homes of the New World" might have been made a capital work, if the author had properly revised and condensed her materials. Mrs. Carlen has written several novels, none of great excellence. Jenny Lind has become Madame Goldschmidt.

In Great Britain there is life for the mind; the Word of Divine Truth is in the hands of the people. Woman must have free access to the Bible, or her genius dies or goes mad. English female writers have sent forth a large number of books during the last three years; yet those already known to fame, have not much increased their popularity. With one or two exceptions, there is nothing new in their productions. The great questions—"Education of Girls," and "Legal Protection for Married Women," are not entered on by these gifted female writers. Mrs. Norton and Lady Bulwer have set forth, in shocking pictures, their own individual sufferings from marital tyranny; but such revelations do little for the moral advancement of public opinion. It needs the advocacy of women like Mrs. S. C. Hall, and Mrs. Mary Howitt, happy in their own homes of domestic peace and love, to arouse attention to the barbarous laws respecting married women, which now disgrace the British code. And there has never yet been made any adequate provision for female education in that old land of Universities, where every means and aid, which wealth, power, and knowledge can gather, are bestowed on the training of the male mind. Yet, "the woman is the glory of the man." The best poem of the last three years is by Mrs. Barrett Browning—her "Casa Guidi Windows," written in Florence, 1851, is a noble production, full of the fire of genius, kindled in the holy cause of humanity. Ireland has spoken worthily by her daughter, Miss Mulock (see page 896), and the author of "Margaret Maitland," is a star of promise for Scotia; and a bud of exquisite beauty has put forth from a cultivated root in England—Miss Anna Mary Howitt, though still in early youth, has taken her place among accomplished artists and popular writers. Her "Art-Student" is remarkable for its power of thought and beauty of style.

In America there has been much literary activity, but, generally speaking, the books produced have not altered the award given the writers in the first edition of "Woman's Record." Elizabeth Blackwell, M.D., (see p. 584) has contributed to popular and practical science a little work of much value—"The Laws of Life; with special reference to the physical education of Girls." There is also a new name deserving note here. Jane G. Swissheim, Editor of a popular newspaper—"The Saturday Visitor," is doing what she can for the cause of womanhood. Her "Letters to Country Girls" is a book of much value to the class she addresses, as a guide to real womanly excellence. Fanny Fern has made a snug fortune, it is said, by her vivacious Sketches, and waked up a host of imitators, who have sent out a variety of works. Before our next edition is prepared, the claims of these new writers to more particular notice may be better settled.

But the book of the three years is, as all the world knows, "Uncle Tom's Log Cabin." Mrs. Stowe (see p. 837) achieved a reputation at once by this work of fiction, which was unparalleled in its success. We have no room here for an analysis of the story or the history of its triumphs; these matters will be more suitably discussed ten years hence. But we may say that another work by Mrs. Stowe, just published, will do more to lower the standard of her genius and destroy the prestige which her assumed philanthropy had given to "Uncle Tom's Cabin," than all that carping critics or party writers, who have denounced her first work as "anti-ministerial and anti-christian," could have done. Her "Sunny Memories of Foreign Lands" (query, did she intentionally imitate the title of Mrs. Sigourney's work—"Pleasant Memories of Pleasant Lands?") is a pleasant tribute to herself and her English friends.

A SYNOPSIS OF WOMAN'S PROGRESS SINCE 1855.

In the plan of this work the Fourth Era, beginning at page 563, was devoted to living celebrities. We could thus, on each revision, note the names both of those who had died and of those who had risen to renown in the interval, without disturbing the arrangement of the first three eras.

In the progress of the last thirteen years, the literary world has kept pace with the religious and the scientific. The plans, the desires, and the hopes that have animated the bosom of humanity have found fitting expression in the books of the epoch. In the feeling towards women the last thirteen years have wrought wondrous changes. Yet these changes have been felt chiefly by the Anglo-Saxon nations. On the Continent of Europe the moral influences that renovate society act slowly; and the material forces of civilization are never favorable to women. Germany has but one woman writer whose name is known to us; Spain but one; Italy none at all. No doubt the natives of each country could point out many above the common level; but none certainly have achieved an European reputation, and the masses, save in Prussia, are almost uneducated. The men of France are busy in drilling and preparing for war, while much of the heavier work, thus abandoned, falls to the lot of the women. From whatever cause, the brilliant and graceful feminine literature of the last century seems to have perished from the land.

In England alone, of all the Old World nations, is there a marked improvement both in the popular attitude of mind towards women and in the places which they occupy in Literature. The names of the most distinguished feminine writers have been inserted in our new list; but a crowd of contributors to the periodicals and to the "light literature" of the time remain, of whom, from the limits of this work, only a few, the more distinguished, could be mentioned. Miss Annie Thomas has written three or four novels, somewhat fast and given to slang, but bright, observant, and readable; "Played Out" is decidedly the best. Mrs. Edwards has sent out at least one good book—"Arehie Lovell." Miss Amelia B. Edwards is known by "Barbara's History," which none of her later works has equalled. Mrs. E. L. Linton has published two powerful stories—"Lizzie Lorton" and "Sowing the Wind."

An impulse has been given to feminine education by the efforts of several leading thinkers to allow women of property to vote as householders. Mr. Mill's speech in Parliament pleaded eloquently for their intellectual cultivation. A Medical College has been established in London for women exclusively; two ladies have lately been admitted to practice medicine; and from all appearances a Woman's University is soon to be established. Among the lower classes, a movement is taking place that must greatly elevate feminine character. Mrs. L. N. Ranyard, of London, suggested the idea that poor women, pious and respectable, who could read the Bible, would be the best teachers and reformers of the miserables of London: they could go to the homes of the most degraded, and carry the Bible to the women of the family. When these were reached, improvement would begin. The plan was organized in 1858, and has proved a great success. Many thousands of the poorest families in England have been bettered in their morals and condition; and the influence of the change has necessarily extended to the classes above them. A movement that has paved the way for national education is thus going on, founded upon instruction in the Bible. There is but one Book that can, by its influence and authority, make and keep the homes of men sacred, women honored, and nations free.

IN THE UNITED STATES the higher culture has advanced but little, and in literature we are behindhand; but we may fairly point to the records of women in our late civil war to show that sober judgment and high administrative capacity are nowhere more conspicuous. The management of the immense and numerous military hospitals shows what American women can effect with the brain as well as the hands. The unshrinking courage and faithful tenderness that drew so many delicately-nurtured women to the city hospitals and to the fields of war say more than poems or novels for the elevated feelings and the Christian virtues that form the glory of true womanhood.

These high qualities, we are glad and proud to say, have been warmly recognized and appreciated by their countrymen. Americans are everywhere planning and doing liberal things for the daughters of the land. Vassar College, built and endowed by its noble founder at a cost of half a million, is the only institution in the world where women's education is provided for as liberally as is that of young men in our colleges. A large number of schools or seminaries for its daughters are now being erected by the great Methodist Episcopal denomination, which has, in a work published under its direction, acknowledged that women—the Countess of Huntingdon, Mrs. Susanna Wesley, and Mrs. Barbara Heck—were the Foundresses of Methodism!

The Protestant Episcopal Church in Pennsylvania has fitted up and consecrated "The Bishop Potter Memorial House" as a training school for women in the services of charity and of the church.

We have before spoken of Medical Colleges instituted for women in our land. One of them has lately been liberally endowed. Mr. Isaac Barton, who died this year (1868), has left about $60,000 to the "Woman's Medical College" in Philadelphia. Another great advantage of American women is their employment as teachers in the public schools. This department they have almost taken for their own. In Boston schools, nine-tenths of the teachers are women; and in some other cities the proportion is the same. In all our schools, seminaries and colleges, taken together, there were last year in the United States 100,000 women to 50,000 men teachers, or two women to one man.

Women write the great majority of children's books, and of religious and Sunday-school books in general. They contribute largely to periodical literature; though no new authoress has risen to high reputation. Nor have women been backward in devotion to art; the success of one American sculptress has drawn many to the studio. Philadelphia has already one distinguished name in this pursuit—that of Miss Ida Waugh. In painting, women are fast reaching proficiency. Their works have place in all academies and galleries; in a single exhibition last year there were fifteen, some of them of distinguished merit.

The war literature was mostly ephemeral; among the few gems is "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," by Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, in whose "Later Lyrics" occur many beautiful poems. Among the enduring works we name also "Notes on Hospital Life," by Miss Julia Dunlap, of Philadelphia. It shows that refinement of feeling and culture can light up even repulsive scenes with the delicate beauty of Christian sympathy. All who read the book will understand better how love of country and faith in God can sustain American women in their duties. Its pages are "full of spirit, of wisdom, and of right feeling"—so says the late Right Reverend Bishop Potter. We have had some good poetry in our periodicals; among the best that of Miss Rose Terry, since published in a volume. Among successful contributors to our magazines, Miss Harriet Prescott has been distinguished by her "Amber Gods," and other stories. She is now Mrs. Spofford, and her last work is "Azarian." "Waiting for the Verdict," by Mrs. Rebecca Harding Davis, is the latest American novel that has had marked success; and Mrs. John Farrar has written her best book, "Recollections of Seventy Years," since our last revision.

Our Mission of Woman to Woman must be named. In 1861 the "Women's Union Missionary Society of America for Heathen Lands" was formed in New York City, and a Branch Society in Philadelphia. The object is to carry the Gospel into the homes of heathen women. Our missionaries are unmarried ladies to teach in zenanas, establish schools for girls, employ native Christian women as Bible-readers. All these objects have been effected. We now have native Bible-women in China, Burmah, India, Africa, Turkey, Brazil, and New Mexico. We have established an American Home in Calcutta, where we have now ten missionary ladies; and the calls for more teachers in zenanas are pressing. A native king has opened his palace and kingdom to our teachers. Had we means and missionaries, it seems that the Gospel would soon be welcomed into the homes of all heathendom.

LIST OF THE LIVING, NOT FOUND IN THE 4TH ERA.

B.

BAKER, LADY,

WIFE of Sir Samuel Baker, who won his title by great discoveries in Africa. He was accompanied and sustained throughout the whole expedition by his wife, to whose aid and moral support he pays many beautiful tributes in his work. It presents a touching picture of what the perfect union of married life should be. See "Explorations of the Sources of the White Nile."

BONHEUR, ROSA,

WAS born at Bordeaux, in March, 1822. Her father was an artist, and she herself showed such a decided inclination for painting, combined with such strong distaste for any other occupation, that her desires pre-ailed, and she became her father's pupil. Her predilection for animal painting was soon displayed. She frequently visited the slaughter-houses and poultry-yards of Paris to sketch. Her first appearance at the French Exhibition was in 1841, with two pictures called "Goats and Sheep" and "The Two Rabbits." Since that time she has exhibited every year; and by 1849 her fame was so established that the Government ordered two pictures from her pencil. Her most celebrated painting, "The Horse Fair," cost her eighteen months of labor. Twice a week during that time she visited the Parisian horse fair to study the animals from life. She is unmarried, and lives with her sister and brothers. In 1866 the grand medal of the Legion of Honor was conferred upon her.

BRADDON, M. E.,

HAS become widely known, in the last five years, as a writer of sensation novels. She wrote her earlier stories for the London cheap press. The first that was generally known was "Aurora Floyd." She resides in London, and edits a magazine.

C.

CABALLERO, FERNAN,

DAUGHTER of Don Juan de Faber, a Hamburg merchant settled at Cadiz. Cecilia, his daughter, was born in Switzerland in 1797. Her first husband was the Marquis of Arco Hermoso. She has been twice married since, and is now a widow. Her stories are less novels than pictures of home-life in Spain. The wit, variety, and life likeness of her tales give them a high literary merit. Their faithful rendering of Spanish life is attested by all travelers; and is, perhaps, confirmed by the fact that the authoress sympathizes to the full in all the prejudices of her adopted nation. Her best works are "La Gaviota" (The Seagull), and "Elia." Both have been translated, and are published in America.

CHARLES, MRS.,

THE authoress of the "Schönberg-Cotta Family," was a Miss Rundell, and resided in Plymouth, England. There she became interested in the Roman Catholic faith, and was on her way to a French convent when a young Swiss clergyman made her acquaintance, and was able to reassure her attachment to the faith of her fathers. Her first books were, "Rest in Jesus" and "Sketches of Christian Life," after which came the "Chronicles of the Schönberg-Cotta Family," undoubtedly the best of her writings. The scene is laid in Germany during the Reformation, and Luther is one of the chief characters. This work at once gave Mrs. Charles reputation and standing. She has since published "Diary of Kitty Trevelyon," "Winifred Bertram," "The Draytons and the Davenants," "The Voice of Christian Life in Song," a volume of poems, and several minor works, all of which have met with great acceptance.

COUTTS, MISS,

CONTINUES her noble charities, building churches, founding relief societies for the poor, thus making herself the Lady Bountiful of the people.—See page 634.

ELIOT, GEORGE,

THE nom de plume of Miss Evans, now Mrs. Lewes. She is the daughter of a dissenting minister, and has passed most of her life in the midland counties of England. Her first published book was "Scenes of Clerical Life," which appeared in Blackwood's Magazine, and at once attracted attention. Next came "Adam Bede," in every sense one of the finest novels in the language. From this time forth she took rank as one of the greatest authoresses of modern times. "The Mill on the Floss," "Silas Marner," "Romola," and "Felix Holt," have since been published. The scene of all but "Romola" is laid in her favorite midland counties; the character, the passion, and the incident are those of English farms and country towns; and the local coloring is that of a master; but it is always subservient to that broader human nature whose portrayal appeals to all. "Romola" is a story of Florence in the days of Savonarola; and here again the Italian framework only sets off the power and beauty of the narrative. The critics consider it her crowning achievement; but nothing from her pen has ever belied the promise of her first attempts. She now lives in London.

ELLET, MRS.,

HAS written since 1855 "Women Artists in all Ages and Countries," and "The Queens of American Society." The latter volume has been especially popular.—See page 644.

EVANS, AUGUSTA J.,

AN American, is the authoress of "Beulah," and one or two later novels that were favorably received by the public.

EUGENIE, EMPRESS OF THE FRENCH,

THE youngest daughter of the Count de Montijos, a Spanish nobleman, was born May 5, 1826. Her mother was the daughter of the English Consul at Malaga, a North Briton named Kirkpatrick. Her British parentage secured to the future empress a liberal education and an absence of the excessive restraints imposed upon Spanish girls. In 1851, when Napoleon had but lately come to the throne, she went with her mother on a long visit to Paris; and her beauty and grace soon attracted the emperor's notice. His overtures of alliance with the royal families of Europe had been declined; but his ministry were biding their time, when he suddenly announced his approaching marriage with the young Spaniard. The wedding took place Jan. 29, 1853. Six hundred thousand francs were voted by the Corporation of Paris to buy her a parure of diamonds; but she declined the gift, and devoted the money to charitable purposes. In 1856 was born her son, who may control the destinies of France, and whom she is carefully training for his high position.

G.

GUERIN, EUGENIE DE.

HER "Journal, Letters and Poems" were published in 1863, and have been widely circulated and warmly praised by no less critics than M. Sainte Beuve and Matthew Arnold.

"HAMILTON, GAIL,"

FIRST became known to the public by her contributions to the Atlantic Monthly. We do not hesitate to place her among the best of our essayists. She is terse, witty and vigorous; and in her earlier writings displays a delicate fancy. In her controversial essays she is, perhaps, too much prone to make invective do the work of argument; but when she does reason, her logic is strong and convincing. The names of her books are "Country Living and Country Thinking," "Gala Days," "Stumbling Blocks," "A New Atmosphere," "Skirmishes and Sketches," "Summer-Rest," "Red Letter Days in Applethorpe," "Wool-Gathering," "Woman's Wrongs." Those who have not read her writings should begin with "Stumbling-Blocks."

HOSMER, HARRIET,

WAS born in Cambridge, Mass. From childhood she showed a marked fondness for sculpture. At nineteen she studied anatomy at the Cincinnati University, to prepare herself for her work; and her progress was more rapid than that either of Powers or Clevenger. Some years after she went to Rome, where she has since resided, and where her famous statues have been chiseled. "Zenobia in Chains" was finished in 1860. Since then have appeared "Puck," "The Sleeping Fawn," "The Waking Fawn," and one or two smaller. Miss Hosmer is a woman of whom her country may well be proud; she has gained a place in her art never before occupied by any woman.

HOSMER, MARGARET,

OF Philadelphia. Her first novel, "The Morisons," appeared in 1864, and was very popular. Its aim is to represent the truest type of domestic life. The book is lively, faithful, and well sustained. Her subsequent works, "Ten Years of a Life-time" and "The Chinese Boy," have been very successful.

I.

INGELOW, JEAN,

IS the daughter of a country banker, a man of learning and intelligence. Her childhood was marked by shyness and dreaminess; her life has been quiet and uneventful. Much of her time is spent in works of charity. Her first volume was published in 1863, and was instantly welcomed as the utterance of a real poet. Its opening line, "An empty sky, a world of heather," has been called one of the best descriptions in the language. She has lately followed her first venture with a second volume entitled, "A Story of Doom, and Other Poems." She has also written in prose, "The Cumberers," "Stories told to a Child," "Poor Mat," and one or two small tales. The pieces, by which she is most widely known, are "Songs of Seven" and "The High Tide." One hundred thousand copies of her works have been sold in this country and in England.

K.

KEMBLE, FRANCES ANN,

HAS written little since 1855; but her readings of Shakespeare are widely known. Thousands have tes tited to their power and pathos. It is remarkable that three women occupy high rank as interpreters of Skakespeare—Mrs. Mary Cowden Clarke and Mrs. Jameson by their writings, and Mrs. Kemble by her recitations.

M.

MOWATT, ANNA CORA,

Now Mrs. Ritchie, has lately devoted herself to literature.

MULOCK, D. M.,

Now Mrs. Craik, has, since 1855, published most of her excellent novels. "John Halifax, Gentleman," greatly increased her reputation; we think it decidedly the best of her works. She has since written "A Life for a Life," "Mistress and Maid," "Christian's Mistake," "Two Marriages," and several smaller books; besides a graver work, "A Woman's Thoughts about Women." Miss Mulock has fairly established herself as a writer of sterling merit. Her books are much read and admired.

MUHLBACH, LOUISA,

A widow lady, widely known by her historical novels. That by which she became known in America was "Joseph II. and his Court," published at Mobile during the war. Her succeeding books are many in number. Among the best known are "Frederick the Great and his Court," "Louisa of Prussia," "Berlin and Sans-Souci," "The Merchant of Berlin," and "Napoleon and Blücher." The King of Prussia has lately conferred upon her the large golden medal for art and literature.

N.

NIGHTINGALE, FLORENCE,

AN English lady of birth and refinement, who, when the Crimean war broke out, gave up the luxuries of her home for the life of a hospital nurse at Scutari. Upon her return she wrote "Notes on Nursing," published in 1860, and since then has devoted herself, so far as her health would permit, to the care and improvement of hospitals.

NORTON, HON. MRS.,

HAS written since our last revision her best poem and several novels—"Lost and Saved" and "Old Sir Douglas." "The Lady of La Garaye" is a graceful story, in melodious and vigorous verse. Little of the minor poetry of this decade can approach it in beauty.—See page 761.

O.

OLIPHANT, MRS.,

ONE of the best of modern writers, but a lady whose quiet and retiring life leaves little room for biographical detail. She is the wife of an English clergyman, and has evidently spent much of her life in Scotland. Her first stories were Scotch—"Mrs. Margaret Maitland," "Adam Graeme of Moss-gray," and some smaller. The work which brought her upon English ground, and at the same time indicated a higher range of art, was "Salem Chapel." This was followed by the "Perpetual Curate," "Miss Marjoribanks," "A Son of the Soil," "Madonna Mary," "Agnes," and "Brownlows." No two of them occupy the same ground; they are remarkable for variety as well as for fidelity to nature. Like Miss Austen, Mrs. Oliphant paints with numerous minute touches; and the picture offered to us is at once pleasant and durable. In 1862 she published her "Life of Edward Irving," highly praised for its style and literary vigor by the English quarterlies.

R.

ROSSETTI, CHRISTINA G.,

THIS writer, who divides with Miss Ingelow the suffrages of critics of modern poetry, is known to us only through her works. Her brothers are noted in the artistic and literary world. Her first volume was, "Goblin Market, and other Poems," which contains many verses of rare sweetness and strength. A second work, "The Prince's Progress," of equal merit, has lately been published. Much of her poetry is religious.

S.

SAND, GEORGE.

SINCE our last revision Madame Dudevant has written many of her best works, though but few of them have been translated into English. She stands alone, now as then, the only great authoress of France. We are glad to be able to say that in her later works there is a decided improvement of moral tone. See page 641

SOMERVILLE, MRS.,

THOUGH now over eighty years of age, has in press a new work upon "Molecular and Microscopic Science."

STOWE, H. B.,

HAS written, since "Uncle Tom's Cabin," three novels: "The Minister's Wooing," "Agnes of Sorrento," and the "Pearl of Orr's Island," the last of which is decidedly the best. She has also published "House and Home Papers," "The Chimney Corner," and "Little Foxes," which appeared originally in the "Atlantic Monthly." All are marked by Mrs. Stowe's well-known vigor and originality. See pages 837, 838.

TERHUNE, MRS. M. V.,

BETTER known as "Marian Harland," first became celebrated as the authoress of "Alone," published in 1853. This has been followed at intervals by "The Hidden Path," "Moss Side," "Nemesis," "Miriam," "Husks," "Husbands and Homes," and "Sunnybank." All are stories of home life. A woman is the chief character, and the interest turns upon her trials, struggles, and final happiness. The language of these books is clear and unpretending, and their spirit is deeply religious. The authoress is now the wife of a Presbyterian minister, Rev. E. G. Terhune, of Newark, N. J. We expect daily another work from her fruitful pen. We should add that most of Mrs. Terhune's later stories have been published in "Godey's Lady's Book."

THACKERAY, MISS,

A DAUGHTER of the great novelist. Some years after his death she published "The Story of Elizabeth," one of the best novelettes of our time. It combines great power of rendering character with a picturesqueness and sweet, vivid fancy, that has ever since distinguished her style. "The Village on the Cliff" is another volume of the same size, and with the same merits. She is now writing a series of charming stories for English magazines.

V.

VICTORIA, QUEEN OF ENGLAND,

HAS, since our last revision, lost her mother and husband, and remains the sole prop and stay of a numerous family, herself unsupported by human strength. The death of Prince Albert has induced her to publish, under different editors, "The Early Years of the Prince Consort," and "Leaves from the Journal of our Life in the Highlands." Both have been widely read, and have confirmed the general opinion of her goodness, her family affection, and her worthy discharge of all her duties as wife and mother. See page 806.

W.

WARNER, THE MISSES,

HAVE written, since 1854, "Dollars and Cents," "Say and Seal," "The Old Helmet," and several smaller books for children. All are written from an evangelical standpoint, and have met with great acceptance among those for whom they were designed. None, however, have exceeded in merit "The Wide Wide World," and "Queechy," which first gave these writers reputation. See page 898.

WHITNEY, MRS. A. D. T.,

ONE of the best of American novelists. Her first story, "The Gayworthys," published in 1866, instantly attracted notice in England, and was highly praised by able critics. The writer was called "a public benefactress, meeting mind and heart in their stress and straits, and giving them words like bread in their strength, and like water in their refreshment." "Faith Gartney's Girlhood" soon followed, and met with an equally warm reception. Mrs. Whitney has since written "Boys at Chequassett," a story for the young. We await with high expectation the future works of a lady so gifted. She resides in Milton, Mass.

WOOD, MRS. HENRY,

A LADY who owes her popularity to the skilful construction of her plots, and her startling incidents. "East Lynne" was the first novel that attracted the general attention of lovers of excitement; and since, her works, whose number is legion, have been sure of readers. Her best stories are "Oswald Cray," "The Channings," and "Verner's Pride."

YONGE, MISS,

AN English writer of considerable merit and originality. Her stories are semi-religious; their tone is decidedly Anglican. "The Heir of Redclyffe" is her most popular novel. Her latest works are, "The Clever Woman of the Family," and "The Danvers Papers."

LIST OF THE DEAD,

WHOSE NAMES ARE IN THE FOURTH ERA.

ARNIM, BETTINA VON,

GOETHE'S young friend. Died in Berlin, January 26, 1859, aged seventy-three. See page 569.

BREMER, FREDERICA,

DIED in Sweden, 1866. Her later works were, "Life in the Old World," and "The Holy Land." Her sister has written her biography, which has been translated by Mrs. Mary Howitt. See page 586.

BRONTE, CHARLOTTE,

DIED March 31, 1855. We published our sketch of Miss Brontë in 1853: in 1855 she died; and Mrs. Gaskell published her biography in two volumes—a work that ranks among the best of its class in the language. To this deeply interesting book we refer those of our readers who desire a more particular acquaintance with one of the most charming writers in the English tongue. In the meantime, we will simply note the prominent events in the last years of her life. In 1851 she spent several months in London, and her letters from thence are one of the most interesting parts of Mrs. Gaskell's book. In 1853 "Villette" was published. It was the last written of her works, and though not perhaps so deeply interesting as "Jane Eyre," is, to our mind, the most powerful of all. On the 29th of June, 1854, she married Mr. Nicholls, her father's curate, and with him spent a few months of quiet happiness. She died in the spring of the next year, March 31, 1855. See page 597.

BROWNING, MRS. BARRETT,

DIED June 29th, 1861, aged fifty-two—died, as we may say she had lived, with song upon her lips. We American women have a peculiar pleasure in recognizing her as the distinguished poetess of the nineteenth century. "Aurora Leigh" will probably stand as her greatest poem. Compare this with "The Princess," or "Idylls of the King," and see in the images of life and truth, in the anticipations of faith and hope, how inferior are those great poems of the English Laureate to this of Mrs. Browning. We cannot but think, when remembering her delicate organization, refinement of mind and feeling, and the sweet womanliness of her character, while we read her strong, stirring, vigorous verse, of the "Angels that excel in strength." Her death was in harmony with the whole of her life. See page 605.

BURD, MRS.,

DIED in Philadelphia, 1858. She was a childless widow, and left nearly half a million to found an institute on a most liberal scale for Orphan Girls. This noble charity is now in operation. The Burd Orphan Asylum was consecrated November, 1864, near the city of Philadelphia.

CORNWALLIS, MISS,

AUTHORESS of "Small Books on Great Subjects," which were attributed to some of the most eminent literary and philosophical men of the day. Her name in connection with them was never known till after her death. She died in 1863. Her "Life and Letters" have been published.

EMBURY, MRS.,

DIED in Brooklyn, N. Y., 1863, aged fifty-six. She had been an invalid during the closing years of her life. See page 653.

FELLER, MADAME,

DIED at Grand Ligne, Canada, March 29, 1868. Her funeral was attended by a large company from Montreal, St. Johns, and other places—Protestants and Roman Catholics alike being present to pay the last tribute of respect to her memory. She was the Foundress of Evangelical Missions among the French Canadian people. She had worked in that region nearly forty years. See page 864.

FERRIER, MISS,

DIED in Edinburgh, 1855. See page 661.

FOLLEN, MRS.,

DIED in Brookline, Mass., January, 1860. She had prepared several works for the young during the latter years of her life, and took great interest in the education of boys and young men, several of whom she fitted for college. See page 664.

GASKELL, MRS.,

DIED near Manchester, England, 1865. Almost all her best books have been written since the date of our last revision. "Mary Barton" was followed by "North and South," "The Last of the Mortimers," "Sylvia's Lovers," and others well known; but her two masterpieces are "Cranford," and "Wives and Daughters." The former (written some ten years ago) is unique in the language. It is a simple, exquisite idyll of "life in our village." "Wives and Daughters" was her last work; and she died before the concluding chapters had been written. Of its power and interest hardly too much can be said: it is the one novel by an English authoress that bears comparison with the masterpieces of "George Eliot." See page 844.

GOULD, HANNAH F.,

DIED at Newburyport, Mass., Sept. 25, 1865. See page 680.

GORE, MRS.,

DIED at Linwood Lyndhurst, Jan. 31, 1861, aged sixty-two. She has written over 200 volumes, and the London Times says that "in all these volumes there is scarcely to be found one dull page. The matter was interesting while it was new, and it will be interesting again when it is old. Some future Macaulay will turn to her pages for a perfect picture of life as we find it now in the upper crust of society." And yet, in spite of all the praise she received, we understand that upon her death-bed she enjoined upon her son and daughter not to have her works republished, nor any memoir of her life written. See page 604.

HAVEN, ALICE B.,

(Formerly Mrs. Neal) married her second husband in 1853, and from that period to the date of her death was a regular contributor to the Lady's Book, and some of her best works were there first published as serials. Among the American ladies who have made literature a profession there is, perhaps, no one whose usefulness and excellence can be more thoroughly admitted. Her life forms a beautiful study, uniting all that is most worthy of admiration and imitation in feminine excellence. Amid the absorbing cares of wife and mother, faithfully discharged, she yet found time to employ her talents in illustrating some principle or teaching some important lesson under the graceful form of fiction, illumined, as all her writings were, by her deep and earnest faith in the truths of Christianity. She died August 23, 1863, at the age of 35, leaving a husband and five children to mourn her loss. Her memoir, "Cousin Alice," has been published by Appleton & Co., and is well worth the study of any young lady. See page 755.

HECK, BARBARA,

THE Foundress of Methodism in America. Mrs. Heck was born in Germany; she was taken to Ireland, and came thence to New York in 1760. Through her influence the Methodist form of worship was instituted in that city, 1766. She died in Canada.

HENTZ, CAROLINE LEE,

DIED, 1856. One of the most popular of American novelists. Her last novel was published after her death. See page 697.

JAMESON, MRS.,

DIED, 1860, aged 63. Our previous notice was down to 1850. She published afterwards but two large works, "Legends of the Monastic Orders as illustrated by Art," (1850) and "Legends of the Madonna," (1852) together with a smaller book, consisting of two lectures on the social employments of women. See p. 706.

KENT, DUCHESS OF,

MOTHER of Queen Victoria, died 1861, aged seventy-four. See page 715.

KIRKLAND, MRS.,

DIED April 6th, 1864; maintaining to the close of her life her character of generous self-sacrifice, and consecration of her talents to the improvement and benefit of others. See page 716.

LESLIE, ELIZA,

DIED Jan. 1, 1858, aged sixty-nine. See page 721.

MITFORD, MARY RUSSELL,

DIED in 1855. Her life ended in the same beautiful place which she has rendered famous by her well-known book, "Our Village." See page 744.

MORGAN, LADY,

DIED on the 16th of April, 1859, and was buried in the Brompton cemetery. Her tomb was erected by Westmacott. Her "Memoirs and Correspondence," an interesting work edited by Mr. Hepworth Dixon, has been published. See page 747.

RACHEL,

DIED at Cannet, near Toulon, Jan. 3, 1858. In 1855 she visited this country, and played a most successful engagement; but her health gave way, and, after a fruitless visit to Havana, she returned to France to die. See page 773.

SEDGWICK, CATHERINE M.,

DIED, 1867. See page 777.

SINCLAIR, CATHERINE,

DIED in London, August 8, 1864, aged 65. See page 850. Since our revision she has written "Cross Purposes," and "Lord and Lady Harcourt."

SIGOURNEY, MRS.,

DIED in Hartford, Conn., June 10, 1865, aged seventy-four. See page 782.

TROLLOPE, MRS.,

DIED at Florence, Italy, where she resided during the last years of her life. See page 801.

AMERICAN MISSIONARY WOMEN.

THE office of mother is the highest a human being can hold. On its faithful and intelligent performance hangs the hope of the world. Next to the sacred office of the mother in her family, who takes the children God has given her and trains them for His service on earth and His kingdom in heaven, comes that of the mother in Israel, the faithful missionary woman who gathers under her loving care the lost lambs of Christ's flock.

The Saviour and apostles bear such ample witness to the worth of woman's services in the True Church, that it would seem a marvel that men who profess to be Christians should ever have disregarded those examples and degraded her from the rank of visible helper, which Christ gave her, if we did not recur to the "beginning" and there find the solution.

"I will put enmity between thee and the woman," said the Lord God to the serpent or spirit of evil. Every wicked man—and the hypocrites are not few—in the church, and the "old leaven" of sin remaining in good men, are at "enmity" with the superior moral truth and purity of the feminine sex. Hence the devices of Satan, through his human agents, to keep from woman all means of knowledge, all opportunities of active influence in the Saviour's cause. Hence licentiousness, the degradation of woman to the sensual passions of men, reigns over the whole heathen world. Would that it reigned only there! but in three-fourths of those nations which profess Christianity, women are kept in almost total ignorance of their own powers, and, of course, have not the knowledge of their own duties. None but the Protestant Church has God's Word for its law. All other churches are ruled by the civil or spiritual authority of men. Everywhere these men, kings or priests, are at "enmity" with the development of feminine intellect, which would, with its heaven-kindled light, soon unveil the monstrous falsehoods, corruptions, and impurities, which now are hidden under the mask of religious forms, ceremonies, and traditions.

The Protestant Church is slowly but surely moving onward in its Gospel duty of evangelizing the world; but these movements are almost entirely confined to Great Britain and the United States. The American Protestant Churches entering on missionary labours among heathens and infidels, adopted from the first the apostolic manner of disseminating divine truths and teaching human duties. They employed women as well as men. With the ordained missionary preacher went his wife as the "help" Heaven had appointed him, and the success has been most encouraging.

It was my wish to give the world a Record of the deeds of those noble women. A number of them are noticed in the body of this work, but far the greater portion have, as yet, no history but with their own families and in the hearts of those they have served. Still, it will be an encouragement to such of the sex as wish to work in God's cause, to read even the names of their sisters who have felt the same desires and hopes, and gone forward, doing what they could.

American Foreign Missionaries of both sexes have, in one respect, peculiar claims on the sympathy of the Christian world. They leave their own country, the protecting power of their own government, and, resting only on the Saviour's promise—"Lo, I am with you alway"—they carry His Gospel into the darkest places of the kingdom of evil, and plant their homes in the land of Buddha, of Brahm, of Fo, of Mahomet, without shrinking from the conflict with all that is most vile, loathsome, and miserable, in the prosecution of their voluntarily assumed duties. In such places has dwelt many a pious daughter of America, and the success of Foreign Missions is greatly owing to their intelligence and zeal.

It will be seen by the list of names that I have obtained records of the Missionary Women sent out by four of the great denominations of American Christians. From the Methodist Episcopal Church the names were not furnished, I regret to say, as that large branch of the True Church owes much of its prosperity to its pious women. In the last Annual Report—thirty-second, 1850—of the Methodist Missionary Society, there are names of life-subscribers and of those who have given bequests. Of the latter the largest was made by a woman: Mrs. Frey, widow of the Rev. Christopher Frey, gave $2516.71; and more than one-third of the eleven thousand life-subscribers are women.

Great Britain has the oldest Protestant Missionary Societies, and sends many women helpers; but their names were not accessible to me. I hope some one among their own people will give the Record of such heroines who do honour to the British nation. The Sketch of Mrs. Wilson (see page 555) is one of the holiest records of British Christianity in India. Has any man done there a greater work for the cause of Christ than did that self-educated woman? The pious daughters of England only want suitable education and encouragement, and they would go forth by hundreds and gather the poor little heathen children into schools, and carry messages of the Saviour's love to the miserable heathen mothers. Teaching the ignorant and ministering to the sick of their own sex must be the work of the educated Christian women.

As yet, how meagre are the means for the training of Missionary Women! Though women teachers have much the largest share in the gratuitous labor of Sunday-schools in our country, and write two-thirds of the books for children and youth, yet there are few liberally-endowed seminaries for young women in the United States; while for young men there are one hundred and twenty-five colleges. A change in this system is now imperatively needed. Three-fifths of the human race are still in heathen darkness. One-half of these are women, who can never be reached by the ministrations of men. Ought not the missionary's wife who is sent among heathen people to be able to instruct her own sex wherever she goes? Does she not need as careful and complete an education as her husband—that is, to be instructed in the languages, moral and mental philosophy, physiology, and every sort of knowledge pertaining to the human nature, which, at its very source, is put by God Himself under her forming care?

One important department of a mother's duty is to preserve the health of her family, and so train her son that he shall go forth to his allotted task of "subduing the world" with a sound mind in a sound body.

How can she do this, unless she understands the laws of health? Medical science belongs to woman's department of knowledge; and never will it be well with the world till she is permitted, ay, encouraged, to study it, and become the physician for her own sex.

To pious, intelligent women, thus prepared, what a mission-field for doing good would be opened! In India, China, Turkey, and all over the heathen world, they would, in their character of physicians, find access to the homes and the harems where women dwell, and where the good seed sown would bear an hundred-fold, because it would take root in the bosom of the sufferer, and in the heart of childhood.

That the practice of midwifery by men should ever have become tolerated among Christian nations, is one of those monstrous anomalies in right reason as well as custom, which, unless we knew they existed, we could never believe. In this respect, heathen women are superior to those of Christian America. It is devoutly to be hoped such an humiliating reproach may soon be removed. Man-midwifery is unscriptural and unnatural; and good men will unite in the efforts now making to give this branch of medical practice to the care of educated women, who may make their profession of great service in the cause of missions abroad as well as of Christian morals at home. Three public seminaries for the education of these physicians are now incorporated in the United States—"The Woman's Medical College of Pennsylvania," at Philadelphia; "The New England Female Medical College," at Boston, Mass.; and "Women's Medical College of New York City." From these, and other medical institutions, it is estimated that nearly four hundred young women have graduated as Doctors—or, properly speaking, as Doctresses—of Medicine, and are very successful in their practice for women and children.

Christ commissioned women to teach the Apostles of His resurrection from the dead; Apollos was instructed by a woman; deaconesses were appointed in the churches; Timothy owed his faith to his women teachers, and the "Elect Lady" was addressed by the holiest among the Apostles, as worthy of great honour for her Christian character. Such were the women of the New Testament!

MISSIONARY SOCIETIES.

The first formed in the United States was styled "The American Board of Commission for Foreign Missions," instituted June 29, 1810, by the Great Association of Massachusetts. The Congregational, Presbyterian, and Dutch and German Reformed Churches, were united in this Mission, which has continued its work during the last forty years. It has been greatly prospered. The foregoing list of names shows its women agents, and it has the sacred glory of numbering among its missionary women the first American martyr for the cause—Mrs. Harriet Newell!

"The American Baptist Mission Union" was formed in May, 1814, and has been in operation thirty-seven years. Among its women helpers are found some of the brightest and truest examples of Christian faith and zeal;—the two Mrs. Judsons and Miss Macomber are worthy to be ranked with the Phœbes and Priscillas of the early Church.

"The American Protestant Episcopal Church Missionary Society" was formed in 1830, and has been actively engaged about twenty years in its great work. Had it done nothing save found the Mission School at Athens, it would deserve the gratitude of all Christendom. Mrs. Hill is one of the noblest patterns of feminine usefulness in the cause of Christian education which the world has seen since the time of the "Elect Lady," whose commendation was that "her children were walking in the truth;"—doubtless those committed to her care for education, like the daughters of Greece to Mrs. Hill.

"The Western Foreign Missionary Society" formed at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, in 1832, comprising a portion of the Presbyterian Churches, was, in 1837, united to the Board of Foreign Missions of the "Old School" Presbyterians. These form the fourth section in this List of "Missionary Women."

Had the names of those sent out by the "Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church in America" been obtained, the list would have amounted to over one thousand. These are "honourable women," who have their memory in the hearts of all Christians. May the next forty years add an hundred-fold to their numbers! The denomination of American Christians which shall provide most liberally for feminine education, and employ most women as agents, sending these out as missionaries' wives, teachers of children, physicians for their own sex—will take the lead in doing good, and, of course, in the true glory of the true Church.

NOTE.—In giving the list of all missionary women sent out by the American Churches, some names may accidentally have been omitted, which we shall regret. Yet it must not be understood that, except those marked (*) dead, all are still engaged. Some, from their own failing health; others, on account of their husband's illness, have been compelled to return home. A few have been transferred to new stations; and all have done something in the Great Christian Work.

NOTE.—At the first view we are inclined to exclaim—"How small the number of Missionary Women sent out by our Episcopal Churches! And so it is—yet the few have done much, and are now wielding great influence. Is it not because these women were better qualified for their work than those of other denominations? Mrs. Hill, and her sisters, the Miss Mulligans, were thoroughly educated ladies, and equal to the great task devolved on them—that of rekindling from the pure flame of Gospel love the light of learning in Greece, so long darkened by idolatry and ignorance. In China, also, the such missionaries are especially commended by Bishop Boone, for their efficient services. How these services are directed, and the wonderful results for good which may be there wrought out by woman's agency, are well described in a letter from Miss Tenney, one of those recently sent to China. After alluding to the anxiety of the Bishop (Rev. Dr. Boone) for the establishment of a girl's school, she says:—

"The danger of the boys forming entirely heathen alliances, the importance of instruction while young, the influence of these girls as wives and mothers, the seclusion of woman in this country, so that the male Missionary cannot have access to her mind—her utter ignorance, as destitute of all instruction in knowledge—her degraded position compared with the daughters of Christendom—and more than all, the fact that half of this great nation is and will be composed of women who have immortal souls of priceless value—all this forms an appeal to which a Christian heart must warmly respond. I know not what measures the Foreign Committee may have already taken to advance this object, but such is our sense of the great and immediate need of a Girls Institution, that we know not how to wait for the slow accumulation of funds by ordinary contributions. It has occurred to me that this object commends itself, in a peculiar manner, to the special attention, sympathy and aid of Christian women at home. The cost of the building will be about three thousand dollars. Now, though it is most ardently to be desired that every woman member of the Episcopal Church should aid in the establishment and maintenance of this Institution, a few churches could easily supply our present need. Here is a fine opportunity for Christian women to manifest their gratitude for the blessings of the Gospel to them as women—aside from the great and glorious hopes it reveals for the future world."

MISSIONARY WOMEN OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

IN the first edition of "Woman's Record" we stated that we had not been able to obtain the names of the Missionary Women sent out by the Methodist Missionary Society, (See page 890.) We regret to repeat the complaint, that the same hindrances have prevented a full list being furnished for this edition—namely—the information sought required more time and trouble than could be given to the subject. Is not this doing injustice to the piety and zeal of the women of the Methodist Church? The Missionary Board has wisely adopted the rule of publishing the names of all contributors to the funds. The names of the women who give of their "living" to aid the cause of Missions form a long array. Why not publish the names of those who give their lives to the work!

The Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States was organized in 1784, just seventy years ago. It now numbers over twelve thousand churches, and has four millions of people under its pastoral care. It is the richest Church in our country; the value of its property, by the last census, was rated at $14,636,671. What pious mothers the women of this Church must be thus to train up their children in their own faith! The Missionary Society of this Church was incorporated April 9th, 1839—though it had commenced operations fifteen years previously. It has now extended its Domestic Missions among the Red Men throughout the States and Territories; and the emigrants from Europe—Germans, Swedes, Norwegians, Welsh, French—all are ministered to, more or less, by itinerant Missionaries of the M. E. Church.

Foreign Missions have been but recently instituted by this Church; but the Board has several stations in Africa, also in South America, China, India, Norway, France, and Germany. From all these Missions we have only been able to obtain the following names of Missionary Women all deceased, save three. The name of the Missionary's wife is never given, nor even the record that he is married. Only when the wife dies is the fact, that she has lived and laboured in the Saviour's cause, made known. Is this well? Do not the living need encouragement? To young women who are preparing to go as wives of Missionaries, would not the record of those women who have gone before them be of some import? In our next edition we hope to present a complete list of the noble Methodist women who have devoted themselves to Missions.* Now we only record—Mrs. Bright, sent to Africa, 1834; Eunice Sharp, (colored) Liberia, 1834; Louisa Johnson, (col.) Liberia, 1834; Miss Putnam, Oregon, 1838; Mrs. Kiddler, S. America, 1837; Mrs. White, China, 1847; Mrs. Bastion, Africa, 1849; Mrs. Wiley, China, 1850. She was wife of Rev. J. P. Wiley, M.D., and died November 3d, 1853. Sarah M. Reynolds, Africa; lately sent out, living; Mrs. Wilkins, has a Girls' School, at Millsburgh, Liberia; Mrs. W. Hansen, sent with her husband, to New Mexico, 1852

* Does any Christian man think I am claiming too much for my sex? Let him read, then, the following sentiments, written by that good and great divine, the Rev. Hugh Blair, D.D.—"The prevailing manners of an age depend more than we are aware of, or are willing to allow, on the conduct of women; this is one of the principal things on which the great machine of human society turns. Those who allow the influence which feminine graces have in contributing to polish the manners of men, would do well to reflect how great an influence feminine morals must also have on their conduct. How much then is it to be regretted that women should ever sit down contented to polish when they are able to reform—to entertain when they might instruct. Nothing delights more than their strength of understanding when true gentleness of manners is its associate; united, they become irresistible orators, blessed with the power of persuasion, fraught with the sweetness of instruction, making woman the highest ornament of human nature."

LIST OF AUTHORITIES.

It would be like printing the catalogue of a large library to give the titles of all books examined in searching out authentic materials for this work. I shall name only the sources of general information from which I have drawn. New particulars have been sought by carefully reading the various works of those female writers from whom selections are made. The records of the living have generally been communicated to me from reliable sources; and it has been my earnest endeavour to give only that which is true. Of books that I have consulted, the first in importance and authority are—
